LOCAL AGENT. As a local application for healing the diseased condition in the head, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy is beyond all comparison the best preparation ever invented. It is mild and pleasant to use, producing no smarting or pain, and containing no strong, irritating, or caustic drug, or other poison. This Remedy is a powerful antiseptic, and speedily destroys all bad smell which accompanies so many cases of catarrh, thus affording great comfort to those who suffer from this disease.

PERMANENT CURES. 'The Golden Medical Discovery is the natural "helpmate" of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It not only cleanses, purifies, regulates, and builds up the system to a healthy standard, and conquers throat, bronchial, and lung complications, when any such exist, but, from its specific effects upon the lining membrane of the nasal passages, it aids materially in restoring the diseased, thickened, or ulcerated membrane to a healthy condition, and thus eradicates the disease. When a cure is effected in this manner it is permanent.

Both Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy are sold by druggists the world over. Discovery $1.00, six bottles for $5.00. Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy 50 cents; half-dozen bottles $2.50.

A complete Treatise on Catarrh, giving valuable hints as to clothing, diet, and other matters of importance, will be mailed, post-paid to any address, on receipt of a 2-cent postage stamp.

THE BOY AND THE PRINCESS.

A Child's Gift to the Princess of Wales Highly Appreciated.

A London cablegram says: A boy 10 years of age, who is an inmate of the industrial school at Bute, recently sent to the Princess of Wales as a silver wedding gift some mantelpiece drapery, the work upon which had occupied him many months. In reply he received an autograph letter from the Princess conveying her admiration of the beautiful work, and added that she highly appreciated the loyal feeling that prompted the gift. It is now given out that the Princess has caused inquiries to be made regarding the child's parents and antecedents, and that unless there are obstacles in the way she intends to have it adopted by a noble family and reared under her patronage. "Who knows," says Miss Knollys, the Private Secretary to the Princess, "but that he may become a Premier, or a general or an admiral. Stranger things have happened." The drapery has been given a prominent place in the Princess' private boudoir in Buckingham Palace.

Sensational Elopement Case.

A Montreal despatch says: Rougemont, in Iberville, has a sensation of the nature of an elopement. The cure of that town came to Chief Hughes this morning and asked his assistance in a most peculiar case. Pierre Lecaille is a very wealthy farmer there, who last Thursday night suddenly left his house and his wife and eloped with a woman who used to do his washing. She is married, and leaves behind her five children and a disconsolate husband. The woman is 50 years and the farmer 40 years old. He took with him some $9,000 in cash and leaves to his wife three good farms. He has written to her from Washington Territory, and says that he is happy with his choice—she should do the best she could and might marry if she chose. Chief Hughes said that he could do nothing in the matter.

A singular accident caused the death recently of a woman employed in the household of Ephraim Heishey, at Lancaster, Pa. She went into the poultry yard to catch a chicken for dinner, when a rooster attacked her and inflicted a deep wound in one of her hands with a spur. Lockjaw set in, and the woman died in a few days afterwards.

Just as a son of Dr. Dodd, of Campbell county, Ga., drove up to his house the other day a swarm of bees alighted on the horse, buggy and boy. The horse was fatally stung before the bees could be driven off, and the boy was badly poisoned by the stings of the insects.

"SPOOK" PICTURE CONSPIRACY.

How Portraits of Spirits and Mortals are Produced at Will.

A New York despatch says: The examination in the case of Ann O'Delia Diss Debar, alias the Princess Lotita, and her husband "General" Diss Debar, who are accused of conspiring to defraud the millionaire lawyer Luther R. Marsh by alleged spiritual manifestations, was resumed this afternoon. A large crowd was in attendance. Daniel W. Carvalho was the first witness called. He is an expert in handwriting. He held in his hand a piece of paper which Lawyer Howe offered to Mr. Townsend and which he requested the court to mark. He wanted Mrs. Diss Debar to exhibit spiritual writing on it. She declined to receive it as it was not prepared by herself. Then Mr. Carvalho handed a piece of black paper to Police Sergeant Riley, who, by witness' direction, stuck it on a mirror behind the Judge's bench. Then the witness took a dampened sponge and rubbed it over the paper when the portrait of Adelaide Neilson appeared. In answer to Mr. Townsend the witness said he could not produce a picture in oils on prepared or unprepared paper. The examination will be continued on Monday next.

A Millionaire in a Minute.

Instances are on record where toilers in gold mines and diamond fields, who, by one turn of a spade, a single movement of the hand, have been transformed from penniless laborers to millionaires. But they were not so lucky as is the consumptive who finds a means of restoration to health, who learns that the dread disease from which he suffers is not incurable. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will cure consumption (which is lung scrofula), and nothing else will. For all diseases of the blood, such as blotches, pimples, eruptions, scrofulous sores and swellings, it is unequaled.

A Curious Place to Leave a Child.

The caretaker when going up into the tower of Notre Dame Church, Montreal, yesterday, was greatly surprised to find a newly-born child lying on the floor wrapped up in black cloth. As there appeared to be very little hope of getting any clue that might lead to the apprehension of the mother the infant was sent to the foundling hospital.

An Epigrammatic Statement.

Is there anything in this world so vile
As the pestilent presence of potent bile?
We have it, we hate it, we all revile
The noxious nausea, as did Carlyle.
But why bewail what soon is mended?
Take P. P. P. and have it ended.
All praise the power of "Pierce's Pellet,"
Wise people buy and druggists sell it.

A Life Insurance Fiend's Work.

A singular marriage is reported from Springfield, O. Two years ago a Chicago life insurance agent endeavored to write a large policy on one of his friends. The friend objected that he was alone in the world, had plenty and didn't need to provide for the future. One day, however, he said to the persistent agent: "You find me a wife and I will buy a policy of you." The proposition was accepted. The agent brought about a correspondence between a Louisville widow, a friend of his wife, and the bachelor, which soon became deeply interesting to both parties. In due time a meeting was arranged, the result of which was that the agent wrote a big policy, and his friend ceased to be a bachelor.

Look and Live!

My lady reader, don't pass me by with the unkind remark, "Only an advertisement." I may do you good. I may unfold to your view the "pearl of great price." I may be the means of restoring to you health and happiness. I surely will if you are suffering from any form of nervousness or female weakness, and will act upon my suggestion. I bring to your notice, with every confidence in its merits, a remedy especially compounded to meet just the requirements of your case—Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, bidding you look and live! Ladies everywhere who have used it, speak volumes in its praise!

Mrs. Watson, of Priceville, died on Monday evening, 23rd. She died suddenly while sitting in her chair. Heart disease the cause.

A brisk northeast wind on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday packed the ice on the south shore, and these appears to be more ice visible from Meaford than at any time during the winter.—[Mirror.

A Markdale boy was fooling with a lacrosse stick and a stone one day last week, and managed to break a pane of plate glass in Benson's shop valued at $45. He evidently belongs to the "Hustlers!"

To give some idea of the amount of twine and the extent of nets used by the Meaford fishermen, we have procured figures and they tell us that if stretched in one continuous length the nets would reach 114 miles. The value thereof is about $16,000.—[Mirror.

A four-year old son of Mr. David Olmstead, St. Vincent, was kicked on the breast by a horse on Saturday afternoon last, and for a short time it was feared his injuries would prove serious. We are pleased to state he is now almost entirely recovered and will suffer no ill effects from the kick.—[Meaford Mirror.

A young man of the name of Joseph Webb, son of John Webb of Websterville left his home on the afternoon of the 30th ult., and not returning the same evening, was found dead next day in the neighborhood of Claverleigh, with his face in about three inches of water and his hands in his pockets. He was subject to fits which was supposed to be the cause.

Some crazy, drunk, or otherwise demented galoot on Wednesday night last, about 11 o'clock, fired a number of shots from a gun, either on Bayfield street or in a lot belonging to M. Patten and immediately north of his residence. What the critter was firing at is hard so determine, unless his imagination pictured demons in the air—probably a new phase of "snakes in the boots."—[Meaford Mirror.

At noon last Thursday all the men in the employ of Mr. Hanbury (reeve) numbering about twenty-five struck for $1.50 per day. Business was wholly suspended for a few hours during which the strikers were divided not knowing whether to resume work or not. Some threatened violence to those who started working but did not carry out their threat. The most of the men resumed work during the afternoon and the loading of ties still continues at Crombie's crossing.—[Dundalk Herald.

Mrs. Sweet, of Shelburne, got on the track of her recreant husband, Jas. Sweet alias William Shields, a few days ago and had him arrested on the charge of bigamy he having married a young girl in the vicinity of Alton. He was brought before magistrates Pattullo and Stubbs in Alton on Saturday last and committed to the Brampton jail where he will remain until he gets his trial. The prisoner says his right name is Shields. His first wife who lives here was married to him in 1880 under the name of Sweet. She was present at the trial with her two children, and also wife No. 2 was on hand.—[Shelburne Free Press.

Washington Territory.

We glean the following items from a letter recently received from Mr. W. G. Duncan, of Washington Territory:

February came in with mud which soon dried up and has continued dry ever since no rain since the 28th of January to wet the dust. But, strange to say, the crops are growing well. However, present indications call for light crops, but all depends on the amount of rain we get in June.

Notwithstanding the discouraging appearance of the season, the building and other improvements continue in full blast and the loads of lumber are being drawn hither and thither over the prairie.

Very little sickness here this season, emigrants coming by the train load.

A Good Soldier.

Dr. Christoe has been doing some excellent service in connection with Eugenia Mission (Methodist church) during the illness of the pastor, Rev. Mr. Corcoran. Two weeks ago last Sunday he rendered valuable aid in connection with the Quarterly Meeting services there; and last Sunday he again cheerfully responded to the call of duty. The Dr. never shirks what he considers his plain duty—either in secular or religious matters.

Queens' Birthday, May 24, 1888.

"A Fisherman's Luck."

Two Flesherton anglers were out fishing for speckled beauties on Monday last. In the course of their perambulations both managed to fall into the water and get wet. Then they got terribly hungry, and went to a farmer's house and purchased some bread. One of the anglers ate a whole loaf of the bread himself and then smacked his lips for more. The latter caught eight fish and arrived in town about nine o'clock p. m, greatly exhausted after his exciting day's sport!

Corporation of Markdale.

The following gentlemen will operate the machinery of the newly fledged village corporation of Markdale:—W. J. McFarland, Reeve; Wm. Brown, R. S. Rae, Wm. Lucas and S. Hill, Councillors. Their term of office will expire about the 1st of January, 1889, when a new election will be held. There were a number of aspirants, other than the successful ones, but they wisely withdrew their names rather than put the infant municipality to the cost of an election contest.

Meaford Road.

From our own Correspondent.

Farmers are busy getting in their seed.

Snow fell last Sunday and Monday.

Mr. John Ross left by moonlight some time ago. There are several parties who feel sad about his leaving.

Messrs. Johnston & Hutchison started out bright and early with their milk-wagons on Monday morning.

Arbor Day was duly observed by Miss Ford and her pupils in planting trees, flowers and generally improving the school grounds.

Suggestions to Pathmasters.

Pathmaster Clayton says he has received several suggestions as to the manner in which he and his colleague, Mr. Holman, should spend the money entrusted to them for sidewalk and other improvements. If half of the suggestions were carried out it would use up twice as much money as they have to spend. Mr. Gordon and others are strongly in favor of incorporation, and express the belief that nothing like the amount requisite for keeping up our sidewalk system and other street improvements will be forthcoming until Flesherton has become a separate municipality.

Improvements.

Squire Armstrong is having his handsome residence repainted in attractive colors.

Squire Richardson is making improvements in connection with his residence, by the judicious application of paint.

Rev. T. Watson has been superintending extensive improvements in connection with his residence and the Baptist chapel. Shade trees have been planted on both sides fronting the streets, a neat fence has been erected, a picturesque verandah is in course of construction, and the grounds are being levelled and otherwise greatly improved.

[Other improvements will be noticed from time to time.]

Rev. D'Argant.

Rev. D'Argant, formerly pastor of the Presbyterian congregation at Maxwell, has accepted a call to Burr Oak in the State of Michigan. Previous to his acceptance of the call, Rev. D'Argant had been holding a series of special meetings in Jamestown, Indiana. The following item, which appeared in print before the call was formally accepted, is clipped from the Bronson (Mich) Journal of the 27th ult.:—

Rev. D'Argant of Bronson, will occupy the Presbyterian pulpit next Sunday. The trustees of the Presbyterian society hope by that time, to be able to determine whither or no this gentleman shall remain in Burr Oak. Mr. D'Argant is a young man, appears to be full of life and vim and is a ready speaker. He seems to be likeed very much by the congregation in general, and it is only the question of the necessary salary that seems to stand as barrier between himself and the church trustees. It is to be hoped that this matter may be settled before next Sabbath, and that Mr. D'Argant may become one among us. Burr Oak Acorn. Mr. D'Argant has done faithful and efficient Christian work in the revivals at this place and neighborhood the past winter, and his friends here would be pleased to have him located so near us.

Immigrant Children.

Mr. John T. Middlemore, the founder of the Orphan Children's Emigration Charity, London, Ont., left Liverpool on the 27th inst. in the S. S. L Ontario with a party of 50 girls and 120 boys between the age of 6 and 18 years, who are brought out to this country for adoption or hire, chiefly among farmers. They are expected to arrive at the Guthrie Home, near the city, on or about the 9th prox. This will be Mr. Middlemore's 15th annual visit to these shores with juvenile emigrants from Birmingham, England, since 1872. Already many applications accompanied with good references have been made for the children expected to arrive, but more are required. Further particulars may be obtained by addressing Mr. H. Gibbens, Manager of the Guthrie Home, London, Ont.

THIS PAPER may be found on file at Geo. P. Rowell & Co's Newspaper Advertising Bureau (10 Spruce St.), where advertising contracts may be made for it IN NEW YORK.

The Clock's Reply.

A little girl sat in the door of a hall,
And heard the quaint clock crooning there
The monotonous message Time sends to all;
And said with a wilful, petulant air,
"Hurry, old clock, you are too slow,
I'm tired of hearing you tick and tick,
You are always starting and back you go,
I want you to change and whirl round quick.
I'm tired and sick of being small,
And having to mind and study, too,
I want to be free and wise and tall—
Tall and minded, old clock, like you.
My nest is empty, my birds have flown—
I saw it just now tho' the grass was wet;
Hurry, old clock, I want to be grown,"
But the clock ticked on, "Not yet, not yet."

A young girl stood in the same hall door,
Watching her lover go down the way
He had gone so often, but nevermore
Would come again; then, smiling gay,
She turned to the old clock muttering there,
And said, with the slightest, subtlest trace,
Of her once imperious childish air,
Mixed with her maidenly charm and grace,
"Hurry, old clock, you are too slow;
Though both of us thought you far too fast,
As we often have, a moment ago.
"Oh, if meetings would only last!
Already I long his face to see,
Let the swift moons rise and the swift suns set,
And bring my darling quick to me."
But the clock ticked on "Not yet, not yet."

A sad-faced woman leant in her chair,
In the self-same door at the close of day,
And still in its wonted corner there
Grimly the old clock ticked away
The woman turned from the fading skies
To the only voice in the lonely hall,
And said, with reproach in her weary eyes,
"The same old song since I was small!
Hurry, old clock, you are so slow,
And my heart impatient beats so fast,
The time is tedious, I long to go.
Oh, if partings were only past
And we might meet in that dream and blest,
Where all my troubles I might forget,
Clasped once more to my darling's breast!"
But the clock ticked on "Not yet, not yet."

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

These were the words of Ada's song; and often in the days and weeks which followed—days and weeks of terrible gloom and darkness and unutterable misery—Shirley recalled them with bitter tears—

We made a home, my love and I,
Above the vales where cities lie,
In the soft corner of a hill,
With heav'n above as pure and still;
We thought no storm could reach us there,
But breezes from the upper air
We put our flow'rs and creepers out
To bask in sunbeams round about
The world beneath, pure heav'n above
We dwelt secure in peace and love
We lived in dreams, my love and I,
And took Time for Eternity

So dreamed we all one summer through
Till suddenly the wild winds blew
Ill fared it with our sheltered nook
Our scanting roof and frail house shook
Our creeping flow'rs that hid the wall,
Our roses and our lilies tall,
Were broken by the ruthless blast,
And, far upon the mountain cast,
The tree our fondly cherished shade,
Fell, and vast ruin round it made
"Ah, vain were all my thoughts," said I,
"That took Time for Eternity!"

"We had not even one summer's dreaming," Shirley was thinking to herself as she listened, leaning against the bowlder of rock with a far-away look in her hazel eyes—eyes which were all the more lovely from the shadows under them and the yearning pain which had darkened and deepened them—"not even one summer, only a few short wintry days, my love and I."

Ada Grey's voice continued—

Through the long night the wild storm raged,
And when, toward morning, it assuaged,
The sun shone o'er the hills,
And sweet the breezes blew my heart to greet;
But ruin lay around me where
My home had been so dear and fair—
My dwelling shattered on the ground,
My joys, all broken, lay around.
The breezes I had trusted in,
Like treach'rous friends, had broken in
And robbed me of so much that I
Had deemed was mine eternally

"There is another verse," Lucie said, as her sister paused.

"But Lady Glynn will be tired," returned Ada; then, obeying her sister's glance, she went on, in a louder, more triumphant tone, with the last verse of the song; and, as she sung it, the tall gray-clad figure began its descent again, coming nearer and nearer each moment.

"Arouse thee," said my loved one's voice;
"The house is gone, yet I rejoice.
The storms are kind which round us blow,
Without them we should never know
That love which fades not with the flowers,
Nor shakes when loudest tempest lowers,
Surviving home and rooted tree,
That seemed secure as the hills to be
What matter if all else be gone?
Since love survives, that is alone
A gleam of Immortality,
And makes of Time eternity."

The sweet notes quivered and died away on the soft air; the gray figure was among the bowlders now, looking up. Lucie Grey saw him coming, a tall, grave looking man, with a pointed Vandyke beard and dark gray eyes. Ada was looking at Lady Glynn's face, and she saw it change suddenly and brighten with a radiance which did not come from the sun setting over the sea. Guy Stuart, coming toward them, with his back to the sunshine and his face in the shadow, saw that radiance also; and while it thrilled him with a keen sense of joy, it made his heart ache with unspeakable pain and rendered it very difficult for him to greet Shirley with the quiet courtesy he strove to show when, stepping over the bowlders, he came up to the group and stood beside Lady Glynn as she sat, with the soft fleecy scarlet shawl making a vivid spot of color amid the grays and greens and the deep rich hue of the cliffs, looking up at him with smiling eyes.

CHAPTER XXX

"Those are very nice girls," said Major Stuart, when he and Shirley parted from the vicar's daughters at the foot of the long irregular climbing street which was the principal Easton thoroughfare; and, while the three girls turned off to the left on their way home to the gray-stone ivy-covered gabled Vicarage, Lady Glynn and her companion walked slowly up the climbing street to "Pack of Cards"—a capital, old-fashioned, thoroughly comfortable inn, where Lord and Lady Eastwell, Sir Hugh and Lady Glynn, party and suite, had taken up their quarters.

"They are very nice," Shirley answered, cordially. I hope to see a great deal of them while I am here."

She was looking flushed and bright and smiling—very different from the pale weary woman who made her way so languidly over shingles an hour or two before. The scarlet shawl was still thrown over her scarf-wise, making a vivid contrast with her soft gray dress; the soft chestnut hair curling over her forehead was stirred and lifted by the evening breeze, which was freshening a little now. She looked almost like the Shirley Ross of these few short wintry days when she and her love had "lived in dreams" and taken "Time for Eternity."

"I think Easton sea-breezes have done you good," he said, looking down at her with a smile. "You are looking much better."

"I am almost quite strong again," Shirley answered. "Easton is a very bracing place I fancy. We are all the better for it."

"Who is here with you?" Guy asked.

"The Eastwells and Mrs. Beaudesert, with Captain Layton and Lord Rupert Elland in attendance," she said, smiling. "We have taken up the whole of the accommodation at the 'Pack of Cards,' and have made a great sensation at Easton altogether."

"I suppose so," he replied a little absently.

"Yes; Alice has her carriage here, and the fisher-folk stare at her footmen as if they were beings from another sphere," Shirley said, gaily. "Our suite consists of a man and maid and a groom to look after the pony and carriage; so we are much humbler individuals in the eyes of the natives. You should see the excitement Alice and Mrs. Beaudesert create when they go into church; it is quite ludicrous."

"How?" asked Major Stuart. "What causes the sensation?"

"Their dresses and bonnets," Shirley replied, with a little bright laugh. "They dress as if they were going to the most fashionable London church. I am sure they have a great many sins to answer for through distracting the attention of Mr. Gray's congregation."

"I wonder why this inn was called the 'Pack of Cards'?" Guy said, musingly, as they came in sight of the hostelry in question.

"From its very curious architecture," Shirley answered. "Just look at it for a moment, and see if it has not a kind of resemblance to those houses which children build with cards."

"I hope its foundations are more secure," he remarked, smilingly.

"I hope so," Shirley returned, dubiously.

"Have you had any reason to doubt it?" he asked her, as they both stood still before the pointed stone porch which sheltered the door of the inn, a roomy, odd-looking structure which in the posting days had been rather a celebrated house of entertainment "for man and beast."

"No, and I hope we shall not," was the reply. "I do not like storms, especially near the sea."

"Are you going to make a long stay here?"

"We came for a month or six weeks. And you?" she asked, suddenly lifting her eyes to his.

"Only a day or two at longest," he answered quietly. "I am on a walking-tour, and did not intend to remain here at all until I saw your groom, who told me you were here."

"Then you did not come to see me?" she said, with a little disappointment. "I have been laying the flattering unction to my soul that you had."

"I did not know that you were here," he replied, with a smile. "But I am very glad to see you looking so much stronger. Your husband is well?"

Shirley's beautiful red lips were pressed a little closer together.

"Sir Hugh is very well," she answered, quietly; and their eyes met for a moment. Lady Glynn's color deepened and her long lashes drooped. "I am trying to do as you wish," she said a little unsteadily, after a moment's pause, looking away from him down the straggling irregular street, "but it is very hard."

"Not because I wish it," he rejoined, very gently, "but because it is right, I trust."

"Here they come," she said, suddenly, as a carriage appeared over the brow of the hill. "Lord Rupert and Sir Hugh are riding. Look how the inhabitants of the High street rush to see the royal procession."

Major Stuart smiled as he saw the eager faces appearing in doorways and at open windows as Lady Eastwell's landau drove slowly down to the inn, Sir Hugh riding behind the carriage with a good looking young man whom Guy recognized as Captain Layton, while in the landau were Alice and her husband, Mrs. Beaudesert, a brilliant little coquettish widow, and one of her many admirers, Lord Rupert Elland.

"If Ruby and Oswald could have come with us," Shirley said, with a little sigh, "it would have been so pleasant; but they have gone to Fairholme, and—and Alice would come."

"Major Stuart," said Lady Eastwell, smiling as he went forward to the carriage door, while one of the powdered giants descended from his perch amid the intense excitement and admiration of three or four sunburnt urchins who clustered half shyly, half impudently on the pavement, "what good wind has blown you here?"

"Major Stuart! How charming!" put in Mrs. Beaudesert, with one of her most gracious smiles. "You are not a bird of passage, I hope?"

"I am indeed," he answered, smiling. "I had no intention of staying here, except for luncheon, when I met Sir Hugh's groom, who told me that his master was here, and that I should find Lady Glynn on the beach."

"And where are you going?" Captain Layton asked, while Sir Hugh and Major Stuart exchanged hand-shakes.

"I am 'doing' Devon on foot," answered Guy, laughing. "Do you feel inclined to go the rest of the way with me, Layton?"

"A walking-tour!" laughed the young officer. "Oh, no—it does not sound tempting."

"But you will not start immediately?" questioned Lady Eastwell, while Shirley stood outwardly calm and indifferent, but really waiting anxiously for his answer.

"Mine hostess of 'ye onlye hostelrye,'" said Guy, laughingly, "says that she cannot accommodate me as her house is full."

"Yes, we have it all!" put in Mrs. Beaudesert, glancing up at him merrily. "You cannot think what fun it is living at an inn."

"It is not much like living at an inn when you have a lot of servants with you," said Lord Rupert, laughing, "and necessaries down from London three or four times a week."

"Isn't it?" the little widow questioned innocently. "Never mind; it will be something to talk of this autumn in our shooting-season visits."

"Ah, perhaps it will!" his lordship said, languidly. "Serve to amuse you ladies when we're after the grouse."

"You are all chattering so much that you give me no opportunity of telling Major Stuart how delighted we shall be to accommodate him for as long as he will take pity on us," interposed Alice, in her sweetest manner. "Sir Hugh—Shirley, add your entreaties to mine."

"No other entreaties could be needed, Lady Eastwell, I assure you, and you are tempting me beyond my powers of resistance," Guy answered, smiling. "But I shall not trespass on your hospitality more than one night, and I will start to-morrow, if you will allow me. Perhaps some of these gentlemen will feel inclined to walk a few miles with me."

"I dare say I shall," said Sir Hugh, rather eagerly. "I am tired of this riding and driving. It is almost as bad as London."

"Then you will stay, Major Stuart?" said Mrs Beaudesert, with her most bewitching smile; and, after another momentary struggle with his better judgment, Guy stayed. Ah, how often and how bitterly in after days he repented having yielded to their wishes.

The "Pack of Cards" was, within as without, a quaint and irregular building, with wide low passages and oddly shaped rooms in out-of-the-way corners. The house was spacious and not uncomfortable and there was a wide low-ceilinged sitting-room on the first floor, which opened on to an old-fashioned stone balcony commanding a view of the steep irregular street and a peep of the sea lying beyond.

When the dinner was over, coffee was served in this room, and the gentlemen took their cigars out on the balcony, whither Mrs. Beaudesert followed, tying her tiny lace handkerchief over her head in a coquettish manner, as she stood leaning over the stone balustrade and chatting in soft lowered tones to Lord Rupert, while she puffed away at her cigarette.

"It is so charming to be in a place where you can do as you like," she was saying softly. "Now in Brighton one would not dare to smoke on a balcony."

"Lots of women do," said his lordship, looking at her admiringly.

"Ah, but they are women who have no respect for the proprieties!" she answered. "Now Alice would be horrified if she were to see me smoke."

"No? You don't mean it? I should have given Lady Eastwell credit for more sense," said Lord Rupert in astonishment.

"Oh, she's awfully prudish!"

"Prudish! I like that!" laughed his lordship. "Why, she flirts outrageously with Glynn."

"She tries to do so," Mrs. Beaudesert said sweetly, "but Sir Hugh is quite too awfully in love with his own wife to respond."

And then they laughed softly and spoke in lower tones, and Guy and Captain Layton, smoking at the other end of the balcony, were silent, the latter not a little jealous at the progress Lord Rupert was making with the little widow, the former looking thoughtfully down the street, with its few gas-lamps and lighted shop windows and the blue starlit sky overhead.

Suddenly he bent forward eagerly, and looked keenly after a man who had walked past the "Pack of Cards," glancing up at the balcony as he passed. Guy looked after him for a moment, and Captain Layton removed his cigar from his mouth.

"Any one you know?" he asked, carelessly

"One of Sir Hugh's servants, I fancy," Guy answered, with indifference. "His face seems familiar to me."

"By the way, we might as well go in," drawled Captain Layton. "We are rather de trop here."

Guy smiled as he threw away his cigar and followed Frederic Layton into the sitting-room, leaving the glass doors open behind them. The room was lighted only by a couple of oil-lamps—gas being an innovation which had penetrated only as far as the bar-parlor in the "Pack of Cards"—which threw a subdued light over the shabby comfortable furniture. Shirley was seated at the piano, playing scraps of melody softly with one hand. Lord Eastwell had fallen asleep in an arm-chair in the corner, Alice was dozing in another, and Sir Hugh Glynn, leaning back in a low chair, was watching Shirley's graceful figure in her pretty white dress as she sat at the piano, with a curiously intent miserable look in his handsome blue eyes which rather startled Guy. He moved slightly when the two young men entered, and looked up, then changed his position, altering his chair so that his face was no longer in the light.

"You don't seem very lively here," said Captain Layton, laughingly. "Will you come and have a game of billiards, Glynn?"

"Thanks, not to-night. Shirley, give us some music," Sir Hugh said, his voice changing suddenly when he addressed his wife.

She glanced at him over her shoulder and smiled a little, and his face brightened with such a swift, sudden brightness that it touched Shirley.

"I shall wake Lord Eastwell," she said softly.

"What does it matter! It was hardly polite to us both for him to fall asleep."

"Play something soft," suggested Capt. Layton, "or sing, will you, Lady Glynn? I have not heard you for an age."

"I don't think I shall ever sing again," said Shirley, shaking her head.

"And why not?" Sir Hugh asked quickly, with a sudden anxious glance toward her.

"Because I heard such charming singing to-day—such a delicious voice, so pure and sweet. You heard it, too, Major Stuart."

"Yes, it was very beautiful," Guy said dreamily, his thoughts going back to the pretty group he had surprised among the rocks.

"Who was the singer?" asked Captain Layton, eagerly. "You will be charitable Lady Glynn; you know that I am fanatic, as regards all things musical."

"Does that mean music-mad?" Shirley said gayly.

"Yes. Do take pity upon my madness, Lady Glynn," entreated the young fellow.

"How? By playing to you, or by gratifying your curiosity?"

"In both ways," he answered, in the same pleading manner.

"Who is this charming musician, Lady Glynn? Major Stuart, do take pity on my impatience!"

"She is Miss Ada Grey, the vicar's second daughter," said Shirley, her little fingers straying softly over the keys.

"The vicar's second daughter!" he repeated eagerly. "Is she pretty?"

"I think so," Lady Glynn answered.

"So do I," said Major Stuart, smiling.

"Will you take me to church under your wing next Sunday, Lady Glynn?" said Captain Layton; and, while Shirley answered him laughingly, Guy turned to Sir Hugh

"By the bye, Glynn, that man Latreille, is he still in your service?"

Sir Hugh's face was in the shadow. Had it not been so, Guy Stuart could not but have noticed how it changed, growing pale and startled at the simple question.

"Latrielle?" he repeated. "No. Why did you ask?"

"I thought I saw him pass the house a few minutes since," said Guy carelessly, "and concluded that you must have him here with you. But his is not a very uncommon physique, and in all probability it was some chance likeness which struck me."

Sir Hugh made no answer.

Presently Lord Rupert and Mrs. Beaudesert came in. Shirley, leaving the piano, came and stood by the table, slim and graceful in her white gown: and Alice, rousing up, flushed and smiling, from her nap, suggested a game of loo, a suggestion which was received with acclamation by all but Sir Hugh, Shirley and Captain Layton, who resolved to show his displeasure to Mrs. Beaudesert by abstaining from her favorite amusement and sulking.

The game began amid a good deal of chit-chat and laughter. Major Stuart was playing rather absently, and was looed twice in succession. Mrs. Beaudesert, looking at him laughingly, opined that he must be in love.

"The pretty singer, perhaps," said Sir Hugh, making an effort to appear at his ease. "Layton, look to yourself."

"He's going away to-morrow," rejoined Captain Layton, sauntering over to the piano. "I shall have it all my own way then."

"He's not obliged to go," said Lady Eastwell, smiling.

Captain Layton shrugged his shoulders as he sat down and began softly playing a waltz. Shirley crossed the room to her husband's side, standing beside his chair for a moment.

"Are you not well?" she said; and there was a very unusual gentleness softening the coldness of her voice as she spoke which made Sir Hugh's weary blue eyes brighten perceptibly.

"My head aches," he said. "This room is insufferably hot."

"Shall we try a breath of fresh air on the balcony?"

Sir Hugh rose at once.

"Will it not be cold for you, dear?" he said, in a low tone.

"Oh, no; I have a shawl here."

She allowed him to fold it round her in silence, and they passed out on to the balcony together. Major Stuart glanced up for a moment from the cards that he held to look after them as they went, with a warm and cordial light in his eyes.

"It is pleasant here," Shirley said a little unsteadily, as she stood on the balcony.

There was something new and unfamiliar about this tete-a-tete with her husband which made her feel a little self-reproachful as she remembered how earnestly Guy had entreated her, ere he left her on that day in London, to forgive Hugh the wrong he had done her, and to live in amity with him. She had made but few efforts since then; but she had not been quite so contemptuously cold perhaps.

It touched her now to see with what a hesitating movement Sir Hugh, generally so proud and self-possessed, slipped his hand through her arm. Perhaps she had been harder even than his sin deserved—and, after all, he had loved her!

They stood for some minutes in silence, looking down on the quiet, almost empty streets. The shops were shut now, but two or three of the shopkeepers had brought out chairs and placed them on the pavement, and were sitting chatting and smoking and enjoying the fresh air, while beyond lay the sea, the waves breaking over the shingles with a soft little murmur which reached Shirley's ears. It was all so still and silent and peaceful. Ah, how well she remembered that night long afterward!

Suddenly lifting her eyes, she found her husband's fixed upon her, with a passion of yearning tenderness in their gaze; he was looking deathly pale in the moonlight, and his hand, as it lay upon her arm, shook lightly.

"I am afraid you are suffering," she said gently. "Do you feel ill, Hugh?"

It was the first time, during all the years they had lived together as husband and wife that she had called him by his Christian name, and a sudden gleam of delight flashed into his eyes.

"Shirley!" he exclaimed, in a low voice, full of passionate emotion, and yearning and remorse; and in almost uncontrollable emotion he bowed his head over until his lips touched her hair; then, turning from her, he leaned against the balustrade and covered his face with his hands.

Shirley watched him in silence for a minute. Had he been so unhappy after all? Had he suffered? Had his punishment equaled his crime? Had she been more wicked even than he had been? His had been the crime of a few hours or weeks. Hers had been the sin of four long years, hardening her heart and cherishing vengeance and hatred.

She touched him gently, lifting her slim white hand and trying to draw his from his face; and at her touch he trembled violently, and, throwing himself upon his knees beside her, hid his face upon her hands, kissing them passionately; and with the kisses came tears—a strong man's tears of remorse and pain and anguish.

"Hugh"—Shirley's broken voice was full of a new sweet music, although the low tones were very unsteady—"I have been very wrong. Will you forgive me, and let us begin again?"

"Forgive you, my darling!" he murmured. "Shirley, can I ever forgive myself? Even the excuse I offered at first makes my shame and remorse the greater now. But, my darling, I did love you—selfishly, unworthily, I know—and I was mad with rage and jealousy; but I did love you. Ah, love, I have suffered all these years; and the bitterest drop in my cup has been the sight of your suffering!"

"We will not talk of it now," she said very gently. "Shall we begin again? Hugh, I will try to be a good wife to you. I have been wrong—ah, how deeply wrong!—and you have been very indulgent and good to me always—and—and—let us begin again from to-night!"

"I am not worthy," he returned huskily. "Oh, my darling, are you sure that you forgive? I could not bear to—to lose you again!"

She loosened her hands gently from his, and, as he folded his arms around her, still kneeling, she laid his head upon her breast and felt once more his kisses and his tears.

From within, through the open windows, came the sound of gay laughter and voices and the dreamy waltz-music which rose and fell so softly. Without all was still and silent, as Hugh Glynn knelt, with his head upon his wife's breast and his arms around her, and felt that it would be joy to die thus, and leave her free to be happy, since she had forgiven him.

"Shirley"—he lifted his head and looked up at the beautiful softened face which had surely driven him mad at one time of his life—"is it a dream? It seems to me that joy cannot, ought not to be mine!"

She smiled slightly: it was strange what a feeling of happiness this reconciliation gave her; and, oh, how thankfully she looked back to it in the days that followed, and remembered that the last words she had spoken to him had been kindly ones!

"You feel anything but dream-like," she said lightly, anxious to end a scene which was trying him so terribly. "Is your head better? Has the air done you good?"

As she spoke, she put her little cold hand upon his forehead and softly pushed away the fair disordered hair, looking frankly into the blue eyes raised to hers with such passionate adoration in their depths.

"Shirley—oh, my darling," he murmured, half beside himself with joy and pain and remorse, "will you—just to prove that this is no dream—will you kiss me once?"

She stooped forward instantly and kissed him softly; it was the first kiss she had ever given him.

"Come in, my darling," he said presently, thoughtful for her even in this delirium of happiness which possessed him. "It is cold for you here, and I must take care of you now, my own precious wife."

And, as they re-entered the sitting-room, Guy Stuart, glancing up again for a moment, saw the peace on both their faces, and it was reflected on his own.

"It is a still sultry night," Captain Layton said carelessly, as he went over to the open windows. "I think there is a storm brewing."

"I hope not," Mrs. Beaudesert said, with a little effected shudder. "What makes you think so, Captain Layton?"

"It is so very still, and there is a kind of heaviness in the atmosphere," he answered.

"After a storm comes a calm, you know, and after a calm comes a storm, I suppose?"

Shirley's eyes met her husband's for a moment, and she smiled; but Sir Hugh's glance was troubled. Had he any foreboding of the terrible storm which was about to burst? Were Captain Layton's words prophetic? They seemed so to many present ere twenty-four short hours elapsed.

The Talk of the Day.

Mrs. Jones (who has just moved into the house lately occupied by Mrs. Smith)—"Dear, dear! I never saw such a dirty house in my life. I should think those Smiths never cleaned house while they lived here. And the yard is full of their old rubbish, too. It will take a month to clean up after them."

Mrs. Smith (who has just moved into the house lately occupied by Mrs. Jones)—"Dirt! Don't talk to me of dirt! I've counted ten different kinds of finger marks on the parlor walls. And to think we moved on purpose so we wouldn't have to clean house! It's positively disgraceful to live the way those Jonses do. I'd as lief be a savage."

He Saw the Point.

Jones had married the prettiest woman in town, and Brown had married the homeliest, and thought she was beautiful, says the Washington Critic. One evening they were talking about their respective better halves, and B remarked:

"I say, Jones, I think you and I married the two prettiest women in town."

Jones looked at him in surprise a moment, but he saw he was serious.

"Well," he replied cautiously, and with pride, "I guess you are about half right, old fellow."

Brown didn't see the point until he told his wife.

Treating a Sore Throat.

Labalt, of Galveston, remarked to a friend:

"I've got an awful sore throat."

"You ought to treat it."

"I did treat it at three different saloons, but it don't seem to do any good."—Texas Siftings.

Chauncey Depew has coined a phrase which will probably have a run. He speaks of financial transactions of an uncertain character as "Kathleen Mavourneen loans," because "it may be for years and it may be forever."

The Vienna people can't quite understand how it comes that U. S. Minister Lawton, who was a Major-General in the Confederate army, should now be a representative of the Federal Government at a foreign court.

A fashion paper says that "dresses are worn short." The frequency with which the average American benedict writes out a cheque for "that lovely new dress," would naturally lead to the belief that "dresses are not worn long."

A popular Newfoundland clergyman in a prayer before the sealers just before their departure for the ice said: "Forbid, O Lord, that any seals should be brought within their reach on the Sabbath day, lest they should be tempted to transgress; but, if they should be brought into contact with them on that day, Thou knowest the weakness of our poor, fallen nature, and also how poor they are and how many hungry ones there are at home, and, should they take seals, mercifully forgive."

Elizabeth of Roumania is 45 years of age, and the most talented woman of royal rank in the world. The Queen, or, as she is known in literature, "Carmen Sylva," begins her literary work at 5 in the morning. She rises without disturbing her husband or even her maid; dresses without assistance, and, lighting a lamp, is soon busy with her pen.

Jack and I.

I was so tired of Jack, poor boy,
And Jack was tired of me;
Most-longed-for sweets will soonest cloy
Fate had been kind, and we,
Two foolish spendthrift hearts made waste
Of life's best gifts with eager haste.

Oh! tired we were. Time seems so long
When everything goes well!
The walls of home rose grim and strong;
Like prisoners in a cell
We clanked our marriage chain, and pined
For freedom we had left behind.

Tired, tired of love and peace were we
Of every day's calm bliss!
We had no goal to win, since he
Was mine, and I was his;
And so we sighed in mute despair,
And wished each other anywhere.

But sorrow came one day—the pain
Of death's dark awful fear;
Oh, then our hearts beat warm again
Then each to each was dear.
It seemed that life could nothing lack.
While Jack had me and I had Jack!

WOMEN AND THEIR CLOTHES.

The Progress of the War Against Corsets and for Divided Skirts.

Sarah Bernhardt's empire dresses in "La Tosca" bid fair to do more toward doing away with corsets than all the labors of reformers. If all women had the sort of figures that Bernhardt has, it would be still easier to have her example followed. Lots of great actresses, especially in France and England, dress without corsets in many parts and often off the stage. Sarah, Ellen Terry and Mary Anderson never wear them except in some particular part where the style of dressing is necessarily conventionally stiff. The real way to improve women's dress hygienically is to improve it and make them believe it is improved artistically. Lovely woman is not going to satisfy what she believes to be her looks to any small matters like health or life. The greatest advance so far accomplished has been through tea gowns introduced by fashion. Tea gowns are now recognized as proper wear indoors up to dinner time, and they are generally as hygienic as bloomers, and a great deal prettier. A lady just returned from England, and who has a very intelligent interest in the subject, met Lady Habberton over there. Lady Habberton still insists on the divided skirt without compromise. So she does not make much progress in getting her ideas carried out. The New York lady says that the trouble with Lady Habberton is that she has no real talent or taste or interest in dress. She wants divided skirts because she thinks they are more convenient, not because she admires them. What is needed are women to lead the world in dress who have too much taste to endure big tournure, squeezed waists or bulky crinolines. Then the hygiene will take care of itself. Mrs. Carpenter Fenton, the Secretary of the English Dress Reform Society, is fitted for her position by the fact that she dresses beautifully and always looks like a picture. Mrs. Gustafson, whose gowns were more admired and talked about in the papers than any one else's at the recent women's convention in Washington, is a dress reformer of the deepest dye. She insists on herself and children always being clad in accord with hygienic principles. Some of the best English dress makers are dropping the tailor-made idea and going in for high art effects, which are now much more generally if less startlingly attempted than they were in the heyday of the æsthetics. Mrs. Oscar Wilde no longer does the bizarre, but she dresses with great originality and taste. She wears the divided petticoat beneath her gowns. Most of Mrs. Potter's dresses, both for the stage and private use, are designed to be worn over the divided petticoat. It is quite the swell thing now, but it is too dimpsy for conventionally fashionable frocks.—New York Graphic.

How to Drink Milk.

"What did you drink?" asked the doctor.

"Nothing that could have made me sick, I am sure," replied the patient. "Only a glass of milk."

"Did you drink it quickly?"

"No quicker than usual."

"I thought so. Now, let me give you a word of advice. Many persons complain that they cannot drink milk without being 'distressed by it.' The most common reason why milk is not well borne is due to the fact that people generally drink it too quickly. If a glass of it is swallowed hastily it enters the stomach and then forms in one solid, curdled mass, difficult of digestion. If, on the other hand, the same quantity is sipped, and three minutes at least is occupied in drinking it, then, on reaching the stomach, it is so divided that when coagulated, as it must always be by the gastric juice while digestion is going on, instead of being in one hard condensed mass upon the outside of which only the digestive fluids can act, it is more in the form of a sponge, and in and out of the entire bulk the gastric juice can freely play and perform its function. Milk may be rendered more digestible, and for many, of a more agreeable taste, if prepared by slowly adding a few drops of dilute hydrochloric acid to it, drop by drop, while stirring it at the same time. By this means the curd is broken up, and it is in a more favorable state to be acted upon by the digestive fluids. You follow my advice and you will have no more attacks of sickness such as the one you are troubled with today. Two dollars, please. Good day."—Mail and Express.

Worse Than Reported.

You never hear of a hod-carrier going to a millionaire and complaining that he is tired because he had been carrying bricks all day. He would get no sympathy if he did. But see how differently a man in a humble position treats a man of position when he complains. One of our best and most hard-working judges went up to the bar of the club the other day to get a drink. He felt affable. "Give me a long drink, John, I am very tired. I have so many things to carry in my head in court that it tires me out." "I can sympathize with you, judge," said the kindly barkeeper. "I know how it is myself, carrying in my head all the drinks the boys order."

CURRENT TOPICS.

ABSINTHE was introduced into Western civilization by French soldiers after their return home from the Algerian war in 1844. It is a product of North Africa and the soldiers mixed it with their wine as a febrifuge. Its manufacture is now one of the largest liquor trades in Europe. It is chiefly made at Neufchatel, in Switzerland, where 2,000,000 gallons are produced annually.

THE New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Press describes the new style of shaking hands among women of fashion as follows: The hand of the shakee is seized, brought to a level with the chin, while the elbow is crooked and then not shaken, but flapped. This graceful token of friendship is, I believe, an importation from the land of beef, Badminton and "Bass, you know."

W. W. WILMOT, an old man who appeared on the streets of Montgomery, Ala., a few days ago begging for enough money to buy a railroad ticket to Mobile, has had a romantic history. Many years ago he invented a machine for crimping shoes, and soon acquired a fortune. In 1876 he lost a wager of $75,000 that he had staked on Tilden's election to the Presidency, and since then one misfortune has crowded closely on the heels of another until he has lost his entire fortune and his health as well.

AN interesting development in photography is in the use of clockwork in printing from negatives. By this means a continuous web of sensitized paper is drawn at suitable intervals under a negative exposed to a source of light. After printing the paper is drawn, still by the mechanism, through "washer," "toner" and "fixer" successively, and appears finally as a series of finished pictures ready for mounting, and all alike in exposure, color and tone.

A NEW system of sewage works has been put into operation at Henley-on-Thames England. Its object is to avoid the discharge of sewage into the river—which can no longer be allowed—and lift it to a level which will permit it to be used for irrigation. Ejectors are placed in different parts of the town to receive the sewage, and from there it is forced by compressed air into tanks about a mile distant, and 180 feet higher in elevation. The method is not costly, has proved practicable, and may offer a successful solution of the question of the disposal of the sewage of low-lying towns.

QUEEN VICTORIA has approved of the 1st City of Edinburgh Rifle Volunteers being in future designated "The Queen's Rifle Volunteer Brigade, the Royal Scots (Lothian Regiment);" and of the 2nd Edinburgh, 1st Mid-Lothian, 2nd Mid-Lothian, 1st Haddington and 1st Linlithgowshire corps being in future designated respectively the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th Volunteer Battalions of the above-mentioned regiment.

A FRIEND recently spoke to Louis Kossuth of the flourishing condition of Pesth, when the Hungarian exile said that it almost broke his heart to hear of that beautiful city and not be allowed to see it. The friend suggested that he might go there wearing blue goggles and a wig, after the style of General Boulanger. "No," was the reply, "yet it is just possible that I may see Hungary again. If Russia attacks my country I will go without a wig or disguise, and will visit every village and every city, and give my right arm in the service of my fatherland."

THE British drink bill in 1887 amounted to £124,953,680, against £122,905,785 in 1886, an increase of £2,047,895. This heavy increase, in the absence of any suggestion to the contrary, is attributed to the largely increased quantity of liquor drank in celebrating the Queen's Jubilee last year. The compiler of the above statistics notes one comforting fact in relation to this matter: It is that jubilees do not come every year. Another cause for satisfaction is found in the fact that the bulk of the increased expenditure was for beer and wine, and only a fractional portion was spent in spirits as strong drink.

THE London Spectator tells this story as an example of the futility of empirical knowledge without science: The Commission appointed to inquire into the sea fisheries, of which Sir Lyon Playfair was Chairman, found that on the west coast of Scotland there was a close-time for herrings, fixed at the instance of the fishermen themselves. As the greed of the fishermen has often interfered with the enactment of a close-time, and thereby done great damage to the fishing, this seemed a piece of unusual wisdom. It turned out, however, when the Commissioners came to inquire into the effect of this close-time, that it also prevented fishing for cod and ling. Now cod and ling live upon herring, and the result of the protection given them for several months in each year was that they destroyed far more herrings than all the fishermen in the United Kingdom would have taken in the same period. The close-time had a directly opposite effect from which it was intended to have.

A RECENT British visitor to the Fiji Islands, once the home of a race of cannibals, asserts that the British "govern this population of 100,000, not unaccustomed to fighting, and scattered through a difficult country, with a mere handful of native constabulary." A French official lately sent to Fiji from New Caledonia, "commissioned to discover the secret of our success in dealing with these native races," being informed of this fact, replied: "Well, there is no use in my reporting this to my superiors, because they would not believe me; or if, par malheur, they did believe and tried to put it in practice, we should be driven into the sea in a week." Unhappily, despite official reports to the contrary, the Fijian is rapidly disappearing from the face of his island. Why, the ship which conveyed the acceptance of our sovereignty of Fiji brought also the measles, which swept off one-third of the population. One of the many causes of the decline is said to be "the going to church in a full suit of European clothes, and sitting naked in a draught to cool themselves afterwards." "For this reckless introduction of clothing, the more ignorant missionary of former days has to answer." "The disappearance from the earth of these very fine races is a distinct loss to the world. The experiment of preserving such a race has certainly never been tried before under such favorable circumstances, for the workers have had carte blanche;" still, the writer believes that "what is needed above all is some additional stimulus to exertion."

MISFORTUNES never come singly. Only a day or two before Matthew Arnold's sad death, there died at Oxford Mrs. Thomas Arnold, the wife of his younger brother, and the mother of Mrs. Humphrey Ward, whose novel, "Robert Elsmere," has made so much sensation. Mrs. Arnold had lived with her husband (of University College) in North Oxford for some twenty years past; and she will be greatly missed by Oxford society.

IN Robert Louis Stevenson's paper on "Gentlemen," which will appear in the May Scribner's, he says: "It is easy to be a gentleman in a very stiff society, where much of our action is prescribed; it is hard indeed in every free society where (as it seems) almost any word or act must come by inspiration. The rehearsed piece is at an end: we are now floundering through an impromptu charade."

THERE is a great demand in circulating libraries for Mrs. Humphrey Ward's novel "Robert Elsmere" in consequence of Mr. Gladstone's article in the "Nineteenth Century" wherein the great Liberal statesman's passion for theological controversy largely asserts itself. Although the novel was written with the purpose from which point of view Mr. Gladstone mainly considers it, it also sets forth a love story of uncommon interest with much artistic effect.

DR. OGLE, General Superintendent of Statistics in the British Registrar-General's office, was on the 20th ult. examined before the Committee on Emigrants and Emigration. He stated that the total number of foreigners in England and Wales, including London, in 1881 was 118,000, of whom 17,000 were Americans, 98,000 were European foreigners, 365 were returned as having no occupation, or as being children under 5 years of age. Of the 118,000, 10,583 were sailors and 484 were priests or ministers of religion. Deducting these and other similar classes, there were 46,345 males over the age of 5 years left to compete with native labor, but a further reduction would be made from that number for children between 5 and 15 and for old people over 65. Of this number of 46,345 there was no single trade at which there were so many as 5,000 foreigners engaged. The number of foreigners in London in 1881 was 60,222, the largest portion of whom came from Germany. The foreign tailors in St. George's in the East were in 1881 61 per cent. of the whole tailors in that district, and by 1887 the number had risen to 83 per cent. In other trades, such as waiters in hotels, there was a corresponding increase in the percentage of foreign labor.

COL. W. F. FOX, in an article in the Century for May, takes occasion to show that the much vaunted sacrifice of life by the Light Brigade at Balaklava was far exceeded by regiments during the United States civil war. The Light Brigade went into action 673 strong; the loss in the charge was 113 killed and 134 wounded, a total of 36.7 per cent. During the Franco-Prussian war the heaviest fighting was at Mars le Tour, in which the 16th German Infantry, or the 3rd Westphalian, lost 49 per cent. "But the 141st Pennsylvania lost 76 per cent. at Gettysburg," says Col. Fox, "while regimental losses of 60 per cent. were frequent occurrences in both Union and Confederate armies. In the war for the Union there were scores of regiments, unknown or forgotten in history, whose percentage of killed and wounded in certain actions would far exceed that of the much praised Light Brigade, and nobody blundered either." Pettigrew's brigade, Heth's division—the 26th North Carolina—went into the battle of Gettysburg with over 800 men; it had 86 killed, 502 wounded and 120 missing. In one company, 84 strong, every officer and man was hit, and the orderly sergeant who made out the list did it with a bullet through each leg. It has been said it takes half a ton of lead to kill every soldier wiped out in battle, but these figures show that the chances of keeping metal from going to waste are sufficiently numerous for all ordinary purposes.

Growing Quinces.

Those who have attempted to grow the quince, which is one of the best of fruits for preserving and making jellies, are aware of the difficulties attending the effort. One of the obstacles is the destructive work of the borer if it is not arrested in its depredations. By a careful examination of the trunks of the tree the marks of the presence of the borer can be detected and their destruction effected. Hilling up about the tree with hard coal ashes has been by some believed to be sort of preventive; washing with soft soap suds will sometimes prove effectual in the destruction, but a small wire thrust into the cavity formed in the passage of the worm will serve well in its destruction. Salt strewn upon the surface of the ground seems to promote health, and by some is believed to be absolutely essential to success, and the fact that the quince thrives well upon sea coast farms that are continually acted upon by the salt breeze seems to favor that idea. But perhaps the most important thing is to keep the surface of the soil dressed with coarse manure to a depth of several inches. An abundance of fertilizing material seems to be of greater effect in the vigorous growth of the tree and the development of excellent fruit than any other thing that can be done.

AMONG THE MORMONS.

Memories of a Visit to the City of the Saints — The Men May Have Been Hypocrites, but the Women Were Sincere—A Talk With One of Brigham Young's Widows—Welcome to Extra Wives.

Whatever the Mormon men may be, I believe the women are sincere, especially the foreigners, who are ignorant in the extreme and show it in their faces and speech and manners. Among the better classes, however, the women are intelligent and refined and well educated, sending their sons to college and their daughters to Europe and living in every respect like their wealthy gentile neighbors. Some of them profess to be very happy with their sisters, as they call their husbands' wives, while others openly denounce a system which has brought so much evil to them.

In a pretty cottage near our hotel was a Scotch woman who talked freely upon the subject. She married her husband, who was much older than herself, because asked to do so by his wife, with whom she lived happily for a time. Then fierce jealousies and quarrels ensued, and they lived a cat-and-dog life until the old man threw a bomb into the camp by telling them he was about to marry Rose, a fair-haired Swede of 20. Then the first and second became a unit, and waged war against the third, whose charms, however, prevailed, and she came to rule over them until the first wife died and the second packed up her goods and left the field to Rose, whose blue-eyed babies I saw, together with her husband, and a man of 70 or more. Sometimes the wives are sisters, and in rare instances, I was told, a mother and daughter have called the same man husband, but for the sake of womankind I hope this is not true.

Through the kindness of the wife of one of Brigham Young's sons I was taken to the Lion House to call upon Eliza Snow, a widow of the great apostle, who had, when he died, 18 wives, not including Ann Eliza, and 47 or 50 children. Truly, his state in the next world must be one of beatific bliss if such bliss is proportionate to the size of his family. The room in which I was received was a pleasant home-like apartment, with many portraits of the Youngs upon the walls, and among them one of Brigham. Sister Eliza, as she was called, had been the wife of Joseph Smith, the first expounder of Mormonism, and was about 80 years of age, with the sweet placid face of one who, having outlived the joys and sorrows of life, was patiently waiting for the end. She was very intelligent and well informed, and talked freely upon various subjects, especially that of polygamy, in which she fully believed as something sacred and holy, alleging many arguments in its defence, one of which was that as women, as a class, are much purer than men, it is better for a young girl to be sixth in the love of a good man than first in the heart of a bad one. This did not convince me, as I saw no necessity to be either, but she interested me greatly. She was a Mormon, and had been the wife of a man of many wives, and on that point I had no sympathy with her, but she impressed me as a sincere Christian woman, with nothing in her religion except polygamy which the most rigid evangelist could not endorse: and when not long ago I heard that she was dead I felt sure that she had found the rest she was waiting for when, on the steps of the Lion House, with the moonlight falling on her silvery hair, she gave me her blessing and said good-bye forever.—Mary J. Holmes.

Parted for Only Twenty Minutes.

White ribbon and crape hang to the left of the door at 753 Madison street, while at the right is the sombre insignia of death which shows that an adult has passed away. In the little parlor on the top floor are the remains of mother and daughter. Fannie Wells, an 11-year-old girl, was taken sick about three weeks ago. On Sunday morning her life was despaired of. When her mother, Mrs. Lizzie Wells, realized that the end was not only inevitable but close at hand, the scene was most pathetic.

"Is my little girl going to leave me here alone?" she asked.

"The dying child smiled faintly and in a few minutes Mrs. Wells had lost her daughter. Twenty minutes later the mother was also dead. There will be a double funeral this afternoon, at which Pastor Burns, of the Reid Avenue M. E. Church, will officiate. Four deaths have thrown the family into mourning within three years. Not long ago a daughter ran away and her whereabouts are now a mystery.—Brooklyn Eagle.

750,000 Milch Cows in Ontario.

At the meeting of the Fairs and Expositions' Convention in Toronto yesterday Prof. Robertson, of Guelph, read a paper on the "Use of Exhibitions to the Dairy Industry." The Professor gave some interesting statistics. There are at present in Ontario 750,000 milch cows. The milk of 250,000 of these is manufactured into cheese, 250,000 contribute milk for butter and 150,000 give the milk which is consumed in the cities and country. The Professor suggested that in dairy shows the winners should be ticketed by the judges with a card explaining why they were awarded prizes. This would be a valuable aid to breeders.

CONFESSIONS OF A LADY BENDER.

A Fair Contortionist of 19 Tells How She Learned to Contort.

The other day called on a bender, a lady, not a gentleman, who is well known as a most serpentine contortionist. I wished to ask Mlle. Vonare a few questions about her art, with a view of throwing some light on the training of little boys and girls for the profession. The lady was sitting before the fire with her sister, who has abandoned bending herself, and exhibits a troupe of highly educated poodles. A huge wicker basket contained her dress and other stage habits. From its depths she produced a bundle of photographs of herself, tied and knotted into all manner of curious folds. That is the business of a bender. The body is thrown into a score of unnatural postures, which appear to the audience to be achieved by dislocating every joint in the human frame, and to be effected at great risk to limb and life. Artists are generally enthusiastic about their callings, and I must say that Miss Vonare declared she would rather be a bender than a queen, or something to that effect. She began at 4; at 5 and a half she was before the public, and remains a bender still. "My father saw a contortionist one night on the stage, and he asked himself why he should not teach me, aged 4. I was put into training at once, and enjoyed the fun, as a child will enjoy anything new. Was I beaten? Was I starved? No. I seemed to take to it like a little duck takes to water. You see, we were a family of athletes, and besides, I was a daughter and not an apprentice. If the father is the trainer he may not spare the rod, but he is cruel only to be kind. My experience is that less rod and more kindness is the best plan. Father used to bribe us into doing the different tricks. To be successful means years of hard work, practice and performance. I am 19 now, and my performance keeps me in capital training. In the business of contortion the first lesson is the backward bend, first with the arms, and then without. You stand on a long mattrass, so that there is no danger, and at first your teacher controls your movements with a belt. It is much the same with other forms of acrobatic work, and the cruelty often takes the form of taking away the mattrass, which creates a sort of panic in the pupil's mind. If he has really tried his best and failed, he is so terrified that he is almost certain to fail unless he has a great deal of pluck. If he has only been sulking, it may bring him to his bearings. Of course children are often stubborn and try the patience of the teacher to its utmost limit.

"The art of contortion," continued Miss Vonare, "is learned by degrees. First the backward bend, then the 'dislocation,' then the 'splits,' and so on. What we call 'close-ness' distinguishes the best bending. To the audience bending seems most difficult. But I experience no discomfort or inconvenience. I was a puny child. You see me now." The lady bender was certainly most healthy and cheerful, stout in body and ruddy in complexion, and she strongly maintains that all women would be greatly benefited if they took to bending. "It is quite a mistake to think that we put our limbs out of joint, or that we suffer from the curious nature of our performance. Of course, after one or more difficult positions one may suffer a little pain, but it goes in no time. In some attitudes I can only remain for twenty seconds, as the breathing becomes difficult. But these are trifling inconveniences. I practise a few minutes every day to keep myself loose here in my room, and that is about all I need do."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Chopped Off His Fingers to Escape Work.

Charles Beyers, a convict serving a term in the Southern Prison at Jeffersonville, adopted a peculiar method yesterday morning to avoid manual labor. While on the way to the foundry, where he is assigned to labor, he dropped out of line, and before the guard discovered his intentions ran into the machine shop and, seizing a hatchet, deliberately laid his left hand on a block of wood and cut off all the fingers. This is the third time that Beyers has attempted to disable himself. He was sent to the penitentiary from Orange County to serve a term of eight years for burglary, and is one of the three prisoners who overpowered the jailer at Paola last January, and was prevented from escaping by the wife of the officer, who heard the scuffle and went to the relief of her husband. Standing in the hallway, with a cocked revolver, she called for assistance, at the same time threatening to blow out the brains of the first prisoner who attempted to pass out.—Indianapolis Journal.

Friend (to Mormon lady)—You are very happy with your husband, are you not, Mrs. Brigham? Mrs. Brigham—Very. We are devoted to each other, and he has such perfect confidence in my judgment that he confides all of his little love affairs to me.

Rev. George Barnes, the famous evangelist from the mountains of Kentucky, is a man of striking appearance. He is now 60 years old, is fully six feet tall, and his straight, vigorous form shows no sign of stoop that comes from age. His face shows strength of character and earnestness in every line.

An experience of more than twenty years of judicial life has taught me that more than seven-eighths of the crime committed in this country—which involve personal violence—were traceable to the use of intoxicating liquors * * * that of all the sin and misery, of pauperism and wretchedness, intoxicating liquor stands forth the unapproachable chief.—Noah Davis, Chief Justice of the New York Supreme Court.

THE POLITICAL PETS.

Messrs. J. Gordon Mowat and Robert Gilray will be pleased to learn that the Thornbury Standard does not consider them a "pair of blatherskites." This will act like balm upon the severe wounds inflicted by their brother politician, the editor of the Orangeville Advertiser. The twin politicians will dance for joy and call upon the gods to bless Bro. Farewell for coming to their rescue so opportunely.

But, alas! there are other witnesses beside the editor of the Advertiser, and these corroborate the statements of the latter in every particular. They point out, besides, in emphatic terms, that the "political pets" worked the Scott Act racket for all it was worth during the Dominion elections—distinctly and unreservedly telling Temperance people that they were with them in the great question of moral reform, of which the Scott Act was a forerunner. Here in Flesherton Gilray certainly left the impression that he was an out-and out Temperance man. We have good reason to remember this latter fact, as several good Total Abstinence Reformers came to us and gently hinted that it was our duty, as a champion of Temperance, to support Gilray's candidature in East Grey! A few month's later we find the precious pair—Gilray & Mowat—fighting the battles of the Licensed Victuallers in Dufferin! What a pretty pair of canting humbugs they are to be sure—Mr. Robt Myles and the Thornbury Standard to the contrary notwithstanding.

But the Standard's defence of Mowat & Gilray,—or Gilray & Mowat, it doesn't matter which way you read their names—is not half so gloriously ridiculous, as the statement that it was owing to the speeches made by Messrs. Gilray, Mowat and Myles that the Scott Act was repealed in Halton! In reality, says the Standard, they "did all the fighting in this County (Halton) and were opposed by the great Sam Blake and about forty ministers of the Gospel." The Globe, Mail, Empire, World, and all the other papers have been ransacking their brains for causes to which to ascribe the defeat of the Scott Act in Halton, and after all it remains for a rural newspaper to enlighten the public as to the "real" cause! Gilray, Mowat and Myles did the business, and the Thornbury Standard was the first to discover and publish the astonishing circumstance!

We were not aware, until we read it in the Standard, that Mr. Myles assisted the pet politicians in their ackrobatic performances in the interests of the Anti Scotts. But it is not at all surprising - a kindred bond unites the trio: Myles was defeated thrice in East Grey parliamentary contests, Gilray once, and Mowat well, he may get a chance to "win" defeat some day, too!

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Some fellow around Dundalk, nicknamed "Eggs," threatens to lay in wait for the Editor of the Herald some night and knock his brains out, because the latter spoke in somewhat vigorous language concerning somebody who fell into the bad habit of stealing his (the Editor's) wood. The Herald wonders what "Eggs" will do when he reads what THE ADVANCE said about the same matter. Well, if he lays in wait for the Editor of this paper he will be rather apt to find it an unprofitable business. N.B.—We feed our bull-dog on "scalps" and other tokens of the "lay-in-wait" business.

It is some weeks since the pleasant countenances of the Dufferin Advertiser, Beeton World and Chesley Enterprise have illuminated THE ADVANCE sanctum. Gentlemen, we might worry along without you; but to tell the honest truth, our labors would be considerably lightened by your genial presence. Give us a call.

The Durham Chronicle issued a supplement week before last which contained an article reflecting very severely upon people of the Roman Catholic persuasion. It was full of ranting rubbish, such as no intelligent Protestant would care to publish above his own name. Of course the Chronicle published it in supplement form for reasons very readily understood.

Amongst other things, "Hard-to-Roll"—the defender of the Badgeros outrage in a recent issue of the Dundalk Herald—threatened to "straighten" another writer, because the latter ventured to express his righteous indignation concerning the "eviction." When it comes to threatening, we beg to assure this defender of ruffianism, that in some parts of the world people have been summarily dealt with by "Judge Lynch," who were guilty of lesser crimes than those Badgeros marauders. We merely throw out this hint to show people like "Hard-to-Roll," that they have reason to be thankful, that they live in a country where "Judge Lynch" does not "hold court."

Mr. Vanzant is not going to remove his marble works from Flesherton to Thornbury, as intimated by the News and endorsed by the Markdale Standard. Mr. Vanzant never dreamt of such a thing. He has been urged very strongly to start a branch of his business in Clarksburg; and he has been solicited at the same time, to locate the said branch in Thornbury. The News evidently knew all about it; then why did it not state the simple facts instead of publishing a palpable untruth? It seems to come natural to the News to lie occasionally—especially when it has been hard hit.

Archbishop Lynch, the venerable prelate of the Roman Catholic Church in Ontario, died early on Saturday morning last, in the 72nd year of his age. For over a quarter of a century the name of Archbishop Lynch has been almost a household word throughout the banner province. Now he is no more. "So earthly glory passes away."

"BLUE RUIN" IN KANSAS.

A Kansas Farmer Unmasks the Oily-Tongued Land Sharks.

[According to promise last week, we now give the following extracts from the "Kansas Letter" referred to, addressed to our townspeople, Mr. and Mrs. Reid.—ED. ADVANCE.]

THE WEATHER.

"In the first place, we have had a very cold winter, but not a great deal of snow from the last of November until the middle of January. Since then, a day or two nice and warm, then cold, then warm again, and so on. Yesterday it was nice and warm; to-day we are having a blizzard. These sudden changes cause a great deal of sickness nearly everybody is laid up with a severe cold."

THE CROPS.

"Well, Mr. and Mrs. Reid, we are real glad that you have struck a country where you can raise something. In fact you raised more on your two lots (in Flesherton) than a dozen of us Kansas farmers did on all our land. For the last two years crops have been a total failure most farmers have not even raised enough to feed the little stock they have. We had 80 acres of corn, &c., and all the money I got from the place this year was $4 for peanuts that my wife sold. Out of 60 acres of corn we did not get enough to feed a chicken a week. There was not a thousand bushels of corn raised in Ford county last year."

VEGETABLES.

"Vegetables were also a total failure. We have had no radishes, beans, peas, tomatoes, beets, cabbage carrots, nor anything in the vegetable line excepting potatoes and about a bushel of sweet potatoes. We had good prospects for melons; had out a large patch, and they were hanging full, nice and large—just commencing to ripen—when a hail-storm cut the melons and vines all to pieces! To tell the truth we are all

DISGUSTED WITH KANSAS

and if this year proves another failure, we will all pull out for some other country.....Thousands of people have left the country. Lots of empty houses." .....We have two railroads, there is also another running West on the head of the Pawnee creek, but what good are all these roads to us when we cannot raise enough to live? We are all spending our best years here and are not getting anything ahead for old age—in fact are going back. You cannot sell land at any price. I forgot to tell you that Zetzcorn failed in raising even feed enough for his cattle the last two years and where he fails you know that the country cannot be much to brag about."

FUEL, &C.

"We are glad to hear that you are where fuel is plenty and cheap and can warm up on cold days. Coal scarce here and hard to get all winter, so we had to fall back on the old cow chips, which, you know, is a very poor fuel for cold weather, especially with the thermometer at 30 degrees below zero, as it was this winter! Yes, we often talk of the pleasant times we had when you were here, and would like to be together again—but would not wish you back in this infernal country, where disappointments and failure of crops are the only recommendations."

BRIEF EXTRACTS.

"There is going to be another hard year unless seed of all kinds is furnished the farmers. There are very few who can buy seed..... There are four or five railways heading for here but they will do more harm than good to the farmers, as Dodge city and the gang vote bonds on the County, thus over-burdening the people with taxes..... Money is scarcer than it ever has been..... Lots of cows sold at auction on the streets of Dodge at from $9 to $12 per head. Where one good mule team was once worth $150, you can now get mules, harness and waggon complete for $40 or $50. I saw a team sold for $35, including an almost new set of harness and a waggon; the same man refused $300 for the team of horses alone last summer! Settlers must have something to eat and of course they will sell their all rather than starve."

LAND SHARKS.

"The land sharks send out circulars blowing how the country is prospering, and getting people to come here and spend their money to buy lots in towns, &c.; but if ever I leave Kansas alive I shall give a true history of my ten years experience."

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

Luxuriant Hair

Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.

Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.

Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."

A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.

The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

Protecting the Farmers.

From the Daily Empire.

Ottawa, May 7.—Two topics of interest to the agricultural community were discussed in the Commons this afternoon. The first, introduced in a capital speech by Dr. Sproule, had reference to the bringing into Canada of inferior American cheese, shipping it to Montreal or Halifax, and thence to England, where it was received as Canadian cheese. He showed how great had been the development of the cheese industry in Canada, and advocated the branding of the packages in which the Canadian made article was placed, as well as the American article shipped through Canada, so that there would be less likelihood of the present high reputation of the Canadian manufacture being injured by the exportations of inferior American, as the Dominion product. Several other members, including Messrs. Taylor, Davin, Brown, Scriver and Marshall, bore out Dr. Sproule's suggestions, with the result that a resolution was adopted favoring the introduction of a bill to provide for the branding of American cheese in transit through Canada. The other question was brought up by Adam Brown, and was in the shape of a request for a special committee to enquire into the alleged hayfork swindlers, seed-wheat transactions, etc. Mr. Brown has information that in view of the proposed enquiry by a Parliamentary Committee settlements are being made by parties against whom actions have been brought by farmers for alleged seed-wheat transactions, and in addition an attempt is being made to quash the criminal prosecutions which had been entered. It will be the duty of the committee to suggest a remedy whereby these practices may be put an end to. Mr. Brown made a brief but excellent speech and was liberally applauded throughout.

W. C. T. U.

"Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink; that putteth the bottle to him and maketh him drunken also."—Habi 2c., 15v.

There is something that the law of responsibility carries with it we can none of us get away from, viz., individual influence. Responsibility does not make influence but influence makes responsibility. It fixes on us a type of character that makes us answerable not only for part but for the whole outcome of our lives. If those we touch in our daily lives here and there by words or deeds of ours are given a fatal impulse in some downward path, he that kindleth the fire shall surely make restitution.

We look abroad on society and we see those whose lives are poisoned by baneful influences that lurk as the malaria in the atmosphere—the coarse jest, the bitter invective, the profligate life, or the cold morality that spurns the grace of God, that makes of this or that one a Sabbath breaker, a skeptic, or a drunkard. On him that set in motion the sparks, shall not the responsibility be laid. Any man or woman, who has the opportunity to make their influence felt in respect to any of the great moral reform movements that are so coming to the front as that of the Home against the Bar-room, and does not take hold of it, is a shirk and is untrue to himself. If he lack the courage of his convictions, how can he respect himself or have the respect of others? If he is indifferent, he is a fraud, and lacks not only backbone but honesty. Such men and women give the cause away they profess to have at heart. They are a drag on the wheels of reformation, can not be depended upon, and are not of the same stuff as those who can stand in the gap, holding the banner of truth, cost what it will.

Stay at Home.

From the Pickering News.

The Plattsville Echo-man mourns the loss of his "devil." The boy started reading in the newspaper and yearned to see some of the wide, wide world, so he skipped out. It don't take a boy long to see quite a lot of this world when he skips out. There is a vast quantity of stern reality crowded into a few days when a youth sleeps under hedges and saws wood for what bread and butter he may need. If we had a boy and faintly imagined that he wanted to see the world, we would take him off somewhere and lose him, and by that time he would work, begged, walked and got booted back home again, he would be meek, mild and loveable, and would do his work with a hearty good will. The boy who imagines there is gold lining to every nest but the home one, requires a good waking-up.

Canada's New Party.

From the Empire.

The Third party—formed recently in Shaftesbury hall—is forging to the front again. A meeting of the Central Executive Council was held recently and some important business transacted. Campaign documents were revised and ordered to be printed; plans for local organization were adopted and the appointment of some general organizers confirmed. Other selections will be made shortly and the work vigorously pushed. In regard to the Scott Act the council adopted the following resolutions:

1. That in the opinion of this Council, the recent defeat of the Scott Act in a number of counties by large majorities indicates very clearly that local option no longer commands the confidence of the people as a remedy for the evils of the drink traffic, and that the way is now clear for Prohibition measures pure and simple.

2. That the course pursued in House of Commons in regard to the Jamieson bill must convince every unprejudiced person that both the existing parties are hostile to advanced temperance legislation and that the only consistent course now for temperance men is to aid in the formation of a distinct political party with prohibition as its avowed policy.

Support Home Industry.

From the Dundalk Herald.

The Flesherton Advance of last week contains a very good article on Supporting Home Industry and says that some of the Flesherton people who energetically endorse the sentiments of the Advance, as well as the business men of Markdale and Dundalk, in each of which places there are well appointed printing establishments, regularly patronize the tramp canvassers of certain "cut-throat" city offices. The Advance is correct. In many cases the country printing offices is as cheap as the city office and when people take into consideration the fact that we have to pay freightage on our goods and are not kept steadily employed, and still have to keep regular hands engaged there would not be much wonder if we did charge 15 or 25 cents more than the city. To write down to the city firm costs 3c. To write back the charge of the job costs 3c. To send down the copy costs 3c. and to forward the printing back costs 5c. Your paper costs 1c. and the profit goes out of the district to keep up wealthy firms. If everybody bought things, outside of their own business in the cities and the profits were divided among city firms, the post office, and the express companies, when these men met to spend an evening of conviviality and friendship to gather they would appear in the eyes of each other like the Jackdaw or Rheims as pictured by Cruikshank in the Ingoldsby legends.

Why You Feel

So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best

Spring and Family Medicine

in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

does sell." Prepared by

ECCENTRICITIES OF LOVE.

Philip Koehler Weds His Pretty Marie Louise and Introduces Johannes Grunwald—The False Friend Wins the Wife's Affections, She Gets a Divorce and They Marry—Later, Philip and She Meet, the Old Spark is Rekindled, and They Hope to be Reunited.

A New York despatch says: There is something new in love, matrimony and divorce. Johannes Grunwald and Philip Koehler are natives of the same village in Germany. They were schoolboys together, and learned the tailoring business on the same bench. They sailed across the Atlantic in the same vessel, and began business as tailors in Brooklyn, and in course of time bought houses. Koehler married a blue-eyed, golden-haired German girl, and he was very proud of his Marie Louise. They had a pleasant home, and Koehler invited his old friend Grunwald to call on them and see how happy they were. Grunwald visited the house, not only once, but several times, and at length Philip's eyes were opened to the fact that Johannes was smitten with Marie Louise. The record does not show how long the insidious Johannes had plied his wicked designs before Philip awoke to the fact that his wife's affections were estranged. When he became too sure of the sad truth there was a disagreeable scene, and the result was an action by Philip against Marie Louise for absolute divorce, with Johannes as co-respondent. Four years ago Lawyer Fuehrer obtained a decree of divorce in the Supreme Court in favor of Philip, against his wife. Thereupon Grunwald did not desert the erring Marie Louise. The pair immediately journeyed to Hoboken, where they were married. They returned to this city and took up their abode in Grunwald's dwelling. There they appeared to live happily enough for a time, but at last Marie Louise's conscience began to upbraid her for her faithlessness toward Philip. When Philip and she happened to meet she blushed and he felt his pulses quicken. In short Philip once more fell in love with Marie Louise, and they began to meet in secret. It was a second courtship. Then Johannes began to have his suspicions. He observed that his wife was very often absent from home, and his jealousy was kindled. Johannes followed her unperceived and saw her enter the abode of her former husband, Philip. When she came out he confronted her, and there was a little unpleasantness. Philip looked on from the window of his dwelling. She treated Johannes with scorn, and told him she was done with him and intended to go back to Philip. Johannes has retained a lawyer to commence an action against Mrs. Grunwald. The complaint makes Koehler a co-respondent. After the decree is obtained Marie Louise will probably be remarried to her Philip.

This is a remarkable case. When the Supreme Court granted a decree to Philip Koehler, dissolving his marriage with Marie Louise, it inserted a clause prohibiting her from marrying again during the lifetime of the plaintiff. Now the same court is asked to dissolve a marriage which it has already solemnly prohibited. It will probably find some ground for granting the divorce under the decision in the celebrated Voorheis case, in which the Court of Appeals held that a marriage valid in one State is valid in another. There can be no question as to the validity of the New Jersey marriage.

A WRECKED SPIRIT-RAPPER.

One of the Formerly Famous Fox Sisters Charged With Neglecting Her Two Sons.

A New York despatch says: Mrs. Kate Fox Jenckin, aged 50, of No. 158 East 84th street, was arraigned in the Harlem Police Court this morning charged by an agent of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children with failing to take proper care of her two sons, aged 13 and 12 respectively. Mrs. Jenckin is one of the Fox sisters, the original spirit-rappers, who commenced their career in Rochester thirty years ago, and who afterwards travelled over the world astonishing all who attended their seances. Mrs. Jenckin's husband, who has been dead for some years, was an eminent English barrister. Of late Mrs. Jenckin is said to have been given to intemperate habits and her children have suffered. She was held in $300 bail to answer, and the children were committed to the Juvenile Asylum. Mrs. Jenckin said to a reporter that she has not lost her powers, although her poverty and misfortunes had interfered with their exercise. She said Luther R. Marsh had called upon her frequently for consolation since Mrs. DissDebar's incarceration in the Tombs, but by the advice of her counsel she had refused to see him. The once talented, vivacious and successful spirit-rapper is now a total wreck.

Suicide of a Trick Horse.

A Kingston, N. Y., despatch says: The horse named Hornet, which for years has fired off a pistol, jumped a rope school-girl fashion, rocked in an arm-chair and rope attachment, a la "Rock-a-by-baby," leaped over four horses and a mule, and which in other respects has been one of the chief equine performers in Professor Bristoe's troupe of twenty-three performing educated horses and ponies, deliberately committed suicide here this afternoon. Professor Bristoe calls his show Eques-Curriculum, and he is booked here this week for six evening and two matinee performances. The Kingston Opera House stage is located in the second story of the building. While Hornet was being carried up in the elevator, and when almost at the stage door, it balanced itself, rubbed its head against an attendant, neighed and jumped out on the flagging stones beneath. It was then shot to put an end to its sufferings. There was a big crowd at last evening's performance, and it is said all the rest of the horses, a number of which had witnessed Hornet's death, acted strangely.

Fashion prophets declare that silk is again to become as generally worn as it was before jute and other nefarious admixtures shook our faith in and preference for this elegant material. The price of the best brands of silk is rising, and it has been officially announced that it will be a long time before these can be purchased at the wondrously low rates at which they have been sold for many years past.

FRENCH FOOLS FIGHT.

A Duel With Swords Caused by Teasing a Duke About the Ladies.

A Paris cable says: The duellists are at it again. The encounter which cost M. Dupuis, the artist, his life on Sunday was followed by another on Tuesday morning. The principals are the Duc de Grammont, a well-known sportsman, and M. Raimbault, son of Louis Napoleon's ecuyer, a fellow-member of the Cercle de la Rue Royale. Both gentlemen are dreadful lady-killers, and it seems that both have lately been paying court to the same beauty. Sunday evening, as the Duke and M. Raimbault were sitting at the green table at their club, with a knot of friends, M. Raimbault began to tell spicy stories of his rival's conquests. At first he drew the line at banter, but presently the banter became perilously pointed. The Duke grew fidgety, but M. Raimbault did not notice it. The appreciation of his friends seemed to stimulate his fancy. At last he went beyond bounds altogether. Nothing happened, however, till he chaffingly accused the Duke of having used his name to ingratiate himself cheaply in the good graces of a lady. "The other night," said M. Raimbault, "I called on a lady who shall be nameless. She refused to see me. I sent my card in a second time, with the same result. A third message proved equally fruitless, but this time the lady gave me a clue to her coldness." Here he paused, and, pointing mockingly at the Duke across the table, said: "Look here, Duke, when you go there again, don't use my name and get the door shut against me." There was a laugh, followed instantly by a dead silence as the Duke, turning pale and red with wrath, suddenly rose, leaned across the table and slapped the joker in the face. After this, of course, a meeting was unavoidable. The duel came off very quietly at the favorite duelling ground on the racecourse at Le Vesinet. Weapons chosen, swords; the hour, 1 p.m. General de Bauffremont and the Marquis de Lagrande were the Duke's seconds. M. G. Espeleta and Alfonsa de Aldama acted for M. Raimbault. At the third engagement M. Raimbault pricked his adversary in the groin and the combat ceased. The wound is about an inch in depth, but not dangerous. After the duel the Duke was taken home to his wife, where he is now sleeping quietly. It is rumored in the clubs that he will withdraw from the Cercle de la Rue Royale.

POISONED BY THOUSANDS.

Thirty-Eight Hundred Indians Killed by Strychnine in Brazil.

A New York despatch says: On April 18th was published from Rio Janeiro an account of the alleged poisoning of a large number of Brazilian Indians by one Senhor Joaquin Bueno, whose name, judging from the character of the statement, ought rather to have been Malo. The story showed that Bueno had already poisoned 3,800 Indians, and was meditating the murder of more. The correspondent stated that he merely gave the news as a rumor from the Sao Paulo frontier, and that there was then no opportunity for verifying it. According to late and reliable news from Taubate, which has just reached here, there was something more in the story than mere rumor. Bueno, who resides at Sao Joe dos Campos Novoz, stated that he had under his orders about seventy people employed in the persecution and extermination of Indians. Some days ago they attacked a village and put to flight all the Indians. As soon as the assailants found themselves in possession of the village, being furnished with a considerable amount of strychnine, they set about poisoning all the wells containing water, and the wine and provisions, and after putting into execution this treacherous deed, withdrew without touching anything else. Some days afterward Bueno and his followers returned to the village, and even from a distance they comprehended the horror of the sight from the clouds of crows hovering over the site of the crime, where they found scattered 3,000 corpses.

A DREAD TRAGEDY.

Seven People and Fifteen Animals Burned to Death in a Barn—Suspicions of Foul Play—The Hired Man Missing.

A special from Arlington, Neb., says: At 6 o'clock yesterday morning fire was seen on the farm of the Widow Freeze, one mile out, which was supposed to be the barn of her son-in-law and family, who lived with her. A posse of citizens went out at 8 o'clock to see if all was well, and were horrified at finding the charred remains of seven human beings, only identified by their statures, as follows: Old lady Freeze, Fred. Gratchuschen, his wife and three children, and Fred.'s brother Louis. The remains were scattered in different parts of the barn, among the horses and cows, some fifteen of which were also burned. One theory is foul play, another that each one of the family aimed to save an animal and all failed and were suffocated. A daughter who is away visiting is the only survivor of the family, but it is reported that the hired man cannot be found. It was a horrible and pitiful sight, the laying out of the charred remains of the whole family, which fell among twice their number of dumb brutes. The wife was found under a horse. The coroner has been called. No feud has existed in connection with this family and no enemies are known.

Mrs. Gladstone Talks.

A London cable says: The fashion of turning social into political gatherings was again followed on Saturday evening, though at a house of no importance. What importance the matter had was lent by Mrs. Gladstone, who arrived on the scene to excuse her husband's absence. The host, to her surprise, called on her for a speech. This speech, kindly and genial and altogether informal, to her surprise, was reported in Sunday's papers. Exercises of this sort, with the publicity which attends them, are supposed to counteract in some mysterious way the activity of the Primrose League. Lady Sandhurst's name figures in the report, but this is the Dowager Lady Sandhurst, not Lord Spencer's sister.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain will spend the Whitsuntide recess with Sir William Harcourt, at whose residence Mr. John Morley will be a guest at the same time.

THE LIQUOR QUESTION.

Important Deliverance by the Toronto Presbytery.

A Toronto despatch says: An important discussion engaged the attention of the Toronto Presbytery yesterday on the question of the real relation of the Church to the State in the matter of legislative enactments, and the relation of Church Courts to the individual liberty of members as to the use of intoxicating beverages. The questions arose from the report of the Presbytery's Committee on Temperance, dealing with questions sent down by a committee of the General Assembly. These questions were considered by many members of the Presbytery as interfering with the individual liberty of members, as they made inquiries as to voting for the Scott Act, temperance measures, for municipal officials and other public officers. At last meeting of the Presbytery Rev. Dr. Kellogg submitted resolutions embodying a principle which would limit the action of Church Courts in the matter of specific legislative measures. These resolutions came up for discussion yesterday in an extended form, and after a long debate, in which part was taken by all the prominent members, three resolutions were carried, the last and most important of which reads as follows: "That while this Presbytery therefore holds it to be the duty of the Church to exhort her members conscientiously to bear their part as citizens in seeking to free the community from the curse of drunkenness, they yet regard it as beyond the authority given by Christ to His Church for any Church Court to pass any official judgment as to the specific method in which the civil power may best deal with the evils of the liquor traffic, seeing that in no such deliverance could she justly claim to be speaking from the Word of God and with the authority of Him whom alone she is appointed to represent, provided always that nothing in this resolution shall be construed to deny the right of petition when required by the civil magistrate as specified in the Confession of Faith, chap. xxxi. 5."

TOWED BY A WHALE.

Remarkable Adventure of a Schooner as Told by the Cook.

A Gloucester, Mass., despatch says: A letter has been received from the cook of the schooner H. B. Griffin, Captain George Nelson, now on a trip for salt cod on the Banks, in which a very strange occurrence is narrated. She arrived on the Banks a few weeks ago and found fish exceedingly plenty. One day, which was moderately fine, and while the crew were all out in their dories attending their trawls, the captain and cook remaining aboard, as is customary, the sails being reefed and the vessel at anchor, the two occupants felt a sudden jerk and a moment afterward the vessel was going through the water at a rapid rate. They rushed on deck to find the cause of the commotion, but none was discovered until suddenly a large whale came to the surface to blow, with the anchor attached to his side. The marine monster had evidently been swimming near the bottom of the ocean, where he became attached to the fluke of the anchor. Once on the surface the maddened whale tore through the water at a frantic rate, so fast as to nearly submerge the bows. The captain saw that they were rapidly losing sight of their crew in the dories, and would leave them alone on the ocean, so he cut the cable and freed the vessel. The jibe and foresail were hoisted, and they returned and secured their crew, who had filled their dories with finny freight. The vessel was put on the course for Newfoundland, where a new cable and anchor have been secured.

An estimate of the total grain export from Manitoba to Port Arthur up to May 1st gives the following figures: Wheat, 6,500,000 bushels; wheat in flour, 750,000 bushels; barley, 350,000 bushels; oats and oatmeal, 700,000 bushels; total export to date, 8,300,000 bushels. It is estimated that there are yet to arrive at Port Arthur from Manitoba 2,000,000 bushels wheat and 200,000 bushels coarse grain. The amount of wheat now in store at Port Arthur is 2,694,165 bushels.

Death of a Centenarian.

A Halifax, N. S., despatch says: Norman McDonald, of Big Brasdor, Cape Breton, is dead, aged 110 years. He was the last known survivor of Waterloo, he having fought in that battle under Wellington when 37 years of age. He was borne in the Isle of Harris, Scotland, in 1778, and after serving in the British Army in various parts of the world he emigrated to Nova Scotia in 1833, when 55 years old. He was a man of great activity, and up to two years ago did considerable work on his little farm.

ROYAL MOURNING.

Costumes Worn at a British Royal Drawing-room in Commemoration of Kaiser William.

A drawing-room at which every one must wear court mourning is not a very bright function, says a London letter to the Philadelphia Telegraph. On Friday the court went into half-mourning, which admits of extremely curious combinations of black with other colors, the wording of the rule being: "White dresses or black dresses, with colored flowers or ribbons." The effect is often more strange than pretty. For instance, one lady wore a black dress and train, the latter being lined with sea-green satin, and there were also several other very unbecoming gowns of black and yellow, black and blue, and black and red. Grey was much worn, and there was a great number of beautiful dresses and trains of brocade, interwoven with silver. A particularly striking one was of black and silver brocade, the corsage being trimmed with silver lace, while the train, which was of black striped satin lined with some silvery material, was ornamented with silver cords and tassels. Many ladies must have been glad when they found so few royalties were present, for it is very trying to have to make ten or twelve very low court courtesies, without a moment's rest. The Princess of Wales wore a dress of black gros de Sicile, handsomely trimmed with jet. Her train was of black and gold brocade, bordered with gold and jetted galoons. Among other ornaments Her Royal Highness wore the magnificent tiara presented to her on her silver wedding day by a number of ladies, and the large diamond butterfly given by the Grand Lodge of Freemasons. Princess Christian's dress was of black lace, with a bodice and train of striped velvet. The Crown Princess of Denmark looked very well in her gown of black broche velvet and gauze over black velvet. Her train was of black velvet trimmed with feathers and jet. Her Royal Highness' diamonds were remarkably fine. Princess Victoria, who is tall and nice looking (though none of the Princesses will ever be as handsome as their mother), wore a white satin bodice and train over a jupe of white tulle. This dress formed a pleasant relief to the black ones worn by the other Princesses. Lady Bective presented her daughter, Lady Olivia Taylour. She looked sweetly pretty in a dress of white silk and moire, made in the fashion of the empire. The skirt was quite plain with a bordering of ostrich feather tips. A moire sash was tied loosely around the waist and knotted at one side while the train was of white corded silk. Lady Olivia carried a posy of lilies of the valley, tied with moire ribbon. The two brides who attracted the most attention were, of course, Lady Cairns and Lady Crossley. The former was all in white and the latter wore white and silver brocade, ornamented with white ostrich feathers and silver cords and tassels. Lady Dudley's gown was of white satin trimmed with sable, and her pearls were the envy of all beholders. Lady Delaware wore white satin and gray brocade. The Duchess of Roxburghe and the Duchess of Buccleugh were both in black; the train of Her Grace of Buccleugh being an exception to the general rule, for it was absolutely without trimming of any kind. One of the prettiest gowns at the drawing-room was of gray-striped satin, the skirt being of silver gray crepe, caught up with bunches of thistles and powdered with silver thistledown. The train was trimmed with gray crepe de chine and silver ganze, in which lay bunches of the thistles, and the effect was really quite bewitching.

Books Bound in Human Skins.

Following the example of Mr. Joseph Zaehsdorf, who lately bound two Elzevir editions in human skin, another London binder has executed an order to encase a copy of Hans Holbein's "Dance of Death" in the same ghastly integument, certainly a very appropriate covering for this work. These are not the only instances, however, where the casing of "human form divine" has been utilized. In the library at Mexborough House, near Metheley, Yorkshire, there were formerly two books, Sir John Cheek's "Hurt of Sedition" and Braithwaite's "Arcadian Princes," both bound in the prepared skin of Mary Bateman, the "Yorkshire witch," who was executed early in the beginning of this century for murder; but these disappeared during the cataloguing of the library for sale, when one of the former Earls of Mexborough was in difficulties. Yet another instance: When the writer was last in Paris, he was shown a small book by a dealer, who solemnly avowed it was bound in a portion of the skin of the notorious Louvet de Couvray, and which he valued at 1,000 francs, and for authentication of which he produced a long pedigree.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Effects of Headwork.

One of the hardest things in the world is to condole with anybody in a misfortune or a bereavement. If it were not that the matter is generally serious, a great many funny stories could be printed about the condolences people offer to the bereaved. But up at Sacramento some time ago a hard-working Irishman fell out of a fourth-story window and broke his neck. His wife was, of course, in great distress. After the funeral a neighbor called to offer her sympathy and condolence. "It was a very sad thing, indeed." "Indeed it was. To die like that—to fall out of a fourth-story window." "An' was it as bad as that?" asked the visitor. "Sure, an' I heard it was only a third-story window."

Harry and His Sick Father.

Little Harry, aged 4, had a very sick father, and on being asked by a sympathetic little friend, "How's your papa?" he answered tearfully, "Papa's better—that is for the better land.' Again, in a few words, he electrified his family by asking, "Do they have billiard tables in heaven?" On being told "no," "Well," he said, "I guess papa would rather not go there then."

"Ethereal Mildness" spreads her deceptive wiles to-day, and the trustful citizen proceeds to secure his regular annual "spring cold." Beware the jade! "She's fooling thee."

"I have nothing but my heart to give you," said a spinster to a lawyer, who had concluded a suit for her. "Well," said the lawyer, gruffly, "go to my clerk; he takes the fees."

QUITE A SHOW.

How Lord Lansdowne and His Wife Take in a Play.

I attended an amateur theatrical entertainment here in Ottawa recently under the guidance of Mr. George Johnson, the Dominion statistician. The entertainment was under the patronage of the Governor-General and the Marchioness of Lansdowne, his wife. The entertainment was given in the rather shabby local theatre. At 8 o'clock the orchestra, or the "band," as they call it there, had about half completed the overture, when an aide, hurrying down the aisle, whispered to the leader. In a moment the strains of "William Tell" gave way to "God Save the Queen." The entire audience rose immediately and remained standing while the Marquis and Marchioness of Lansdowne, accompanied by the ladies of the suite and the Governor General's official aides, slowly marched down the aisle and took seats on sofas which were arranged fronting the stage in the space between the audience and the band. As the Governor-General and his companions took their seats and the audience subsided, my attention was directed to the odd costume worn by the handsome men, aides of the Governor-General, who flanked the Vice-Regal party. The conventional evening dress was qualified by blue silk coat lapels and by buttons of gold on both vest and coat. The effect was that of the parti-colored costume of an eighteenth century beau. The performers were unusually clever. They were all members of notable families, the hero being played by Lord Frederick Hamilton, a British M.P. and a brother of the Marchioness. His light comedy talent was not unlike that of Mr. Charles Wyndham. The appearance of the audience was very handsome. It was well dressed and well appointed in every respect. I noticed some very beautiful faces scattered through the house.—Ottawa Letter.

The Old, Old Story.

Love is an old story—so everybody says—a well-worn tale, ancient as the world; and yet there is always a bloom about it as fresh as that of the new-blown rose, from under whose blushing leaves the little god is wont to launch his arrows. Where is the man who has ever had one of Cupid's Simon Pure shafts tingling in his bosom that ever forgets it? (By Simon Pure I mean, of course, the sharp, golden article he usually depends on when he picks out his mark, and not the dull, jilting, leaden-pointed dart with which he once so spitefully pierced the breast of Appolo's "best girl.") Forget it? Oh, no! Time may roll on to white his head and crinkle his brow, yet never to wipe out the recollection of that delicious wound. What would he not give if he could but obliterate the cruel, intervening years? What would he not sacrifice in the way of piled-up wealth and honors and power—yea, every earthly consideration, could he but once more stand in the radiant threshold of manhood, hand-in-hand with love! When she strung his days with enchantment—when with a touch she recreated the earth and sky—and for him; when, at her bidding, the fields and woods and brooks and birds and flowers danced their service on his sense and filled the universe with one sweet mixture of grace and melody and perfume!—Jonathan Easy's Difficulty in May Table Talk.

Rules of Courtship.

Don't disagree with the girl's father in politics, or her mother in religion.

If you have a rival keep an eye on him; if he is a widower, keep two eyes on him.

Don't put too much sweet stuff on paper. If you do you may hear it read in after years.

About Newspapers.

An advertisement in a daily reads; "Splendid opening—village wants newspaper." There are a good many villages that want newspapers, and the inhabitants thereof think that all a publisher has to do is start a newspaper and success is assured. As a matter of fact, taking Ontario all over, one-half of the newspapers published could drop out of existence and then leave only a moderate living for the balance.—Clinton New Era.

A stout, red-nosed man in an hotel offered to wager a sovereign that he could close his eyes and simply by taste name any kind of liquor in the place. The bet was taken. "This is genuine port," said the fat man tasting from a wine-glass; "and this is whiskey;" and so on. A wag then poured a few drops of water into a glass and handed it to the taster. "This is—ah—ah—this is——" —tasting it several times. "By Jupiter, gentlemen, I have lost the bet! I never tasted this liquor before."

"Did your son take the valedictory," college?" said a gentleman to a lady who was enthusiastically praising the ability in her offspring. "No, indeed, he did not she replied with pride. "He didn't take anything. He is the healthiest boy that ever saw."

A SALVATION ARMY WEDDING.

Peculiar Ceremonies on the Occasion—A Present of Twenty-Five Thousand Dollars.

At the Salvation Army Congress Hall, Clapton, England, April 10th, Miss Emma Moss Booth was married to Commissioner F. De Latour Tucker, who has for some time been conducting the affairs of the Salvation Army in India. The London Telegraph supplies the following particulars of the day's proceedings:

Mr. Tucker resigned his appointment as an assistant commissioner in the Punjab district of the Bombay presidency and joined the "army." Mindful of a prophecy of the famous Brahmo Chunder Sen to the effect that "When Christ steps out of trousers and shoes India will accept Him," the commissioner adopted the native garb and turban, and as a rule, goes about barefooted. He is a slight pale-faced man, with a high forehead and somewhat mournful eye and an enthusiastic expression. He wore loose silk Indian robes, over which was the "S. A." jersey, and on his head a delicate apricot-colored turban, on which was the word "Muktifang" on a yellow band—the Hindostanee of the "army." Near to him on the platform sat the bride, dressed in the well-known blue serge costume, but without the bonnet, her own fair hair being tossed all over her head. Around them on the platform were grouped the general and all the Booth family. The hall was filled with about five thousand people, chiefly "soldiers" and "sisters," the majority of whom had paid 5 shillings each for admission in order to help to make up the £5,000 "wedding present" the general desired to give the young couple to start with. In front of the stage was a group of recently-converted native Indians, both men and women, of the Tamil and Cingalese nations. A small select "body-guard" of ten "lassies," wearing white sashes, on which was embroidered in red the word "Hallelujah!" was in attendance on the bride. The "general" personally conducted the ceremony, which began with a short address and hymn, followed by a prayer in vigorous and, indeed, excellent English from "Maj. Muya Bhai." When the Indian "soldiers" had given a small sacred concert to the accompaniment of their native instruments, Gen. Booth read a psalm and introduced the converted "captain" of certain Hindoo "forty thieves," who gave a highly excitable account of his "experiences," which were translated by the "major" acting as interpreter. The "articles of marriage" having been read, special words were then said by bride and bridegroom to the effect that neither would "ever seek to prevent the other giving away, or doing anything, or suffering anything, dictated by conscience for the good of the army." The service was then proceeded with in the accustomed formula of questions and answers. The bride seemed strongly moved in the early part of the ceremony; but the bridegroom took things very calmly, frequently laughing at the "general's" merry little jests, which he threw in now and then, with his accustomed vivacity, to brighten things up. Much laughter arose when the ring made its appearance, and the "general," interrupting the service, explained that both he and his son-in-law had "severe conscientious misgivings" as to the wisdom or necessity of using a ring at all. "No one in the army ought to wear gold or silver at all," said the "general," "and if any of them did so far forget themselves he trusted they would put the things in the poor box when it came round." As to this ring, "Well, I don't like it, but it conforms to the usages of this benighted country." Mrs. Booth (senior) delivered a pathetic address, interrupted only once by an affectionate joke from the "general" touching their own wedding day, twenty-six years ago. In the course of her remarks she observed that if Christ were to return to earth He would come to the Salvation Army, who would receive Him, as no other body probably would be inclined to accept Him. Then followed the collection for the wedding present, during which process the "Marechal" and her husband sang a pretty hymn, the "Secret it is Love," with full orchestral accompaniment. The "general" encouraged the collection, and added in his pleasantest and most amiable way that it was his birthday, and that "he thought he ought to have a birthday present, and that he wished himself many happy returns of the day, as he hoped all those in the hall did. After a few words from the bridegroom the bride came forward and, after beginning with some difficulty, burst into a singularly sincere, and at moments startlingly impressive, address concerning her own life and the duty and love she owed to the Army, to her parents and to her brothers and sisters. In the course of her speech her brother Herbert stepped out and kissed her, amid cheers. The proceedings, which lasted two hours, were concluded with a prayer by the "general."

Luncheon was subsequently served in the "Temple" and in a large marque to invited guests and such others as wished to purchase "banquet tickets" at 2 shillings and 6 pence each. After the repast, which was of a purely temperance character, the "general" spoke at considerable length on the progress the Army had made. The remainder of the sum of £5,000 promised to the newly married pair was made up before the meeting separated, and the "general" stated they would now go on a tour in the Provinces to raise a second £5,000, and concluded by a combined request for prayers and purses. In the evening, at 7 o'clock, a great Indian durbar was held, under the command of Fakir Singh, in which Indian songs and scenes were introduced and addresses delivered.

"Do You Licker?"

A man of a mathematical turn of mind made an interesting calculation as to the amount of whiskey consumed by a steady drinker who takes on an average 20 drinks a day, writes a New York correspondent. This would give 140 drinks a week, or 7,280 a year. Supposing it true that a man can keep up such an average for twenty years, he would have taken at the end of that time the enormous total of 145,600. The average drink is about 70 to the gallon. Dividing 145,600 by 70, it is seen that the man has imbibed 2,080 gallons of whiskey, or about 57 barrels, allowing 36 gallons to the barrel. Supposing that the man's drinks cost him on an average 10 cents a drink, it is seen that he has spent a handsome little fortune in the course of twenty years.

A CURIOUS BOY ORATOR.

An Infant Prodigy Who Uses Big Words and Talks Temperance.

Master Robert F. Williams, "the boy orator of New York," made the address at a Sunday school temperance meeting at Waugh chapel yesterday afternoon. The chapel was full of small children and ladies, although an occasional man could be detected in the audience. The boy orator was a fragile manikin of about 10 years, with light brown hair curling in corkscrew ringlets down his back. A fairly-shaped head with a bulge in the region of memory was set with an oldish but inexpressive face. A large mouth with flexible lips made up the ensemble. From the mouth proceeded a voice which tried to sound impressive by being pitched at a low key, but was only bombastic. The "boy orator" delivered an address nearly three-quarters of an hour in length, full of platitudes and high sounding sentences. He is no Josef Hofmann, but merely the distorted product of some forcing school, whose parrot-like memory has been crammed, like the wax cylinders of a graphophone, with certain sentences. No doubt he could be started at any part of his address and would speak his little piece with equal mechanical accuracy, backward or forward. The effect of his address would have been enhanced if he had taught something containing less sound and more sense. His remarks indicated a vocabulary of not less than 8,000 words. He used such expressions as continuous, formidable, diffuse, appealing, institutions, expression, elective franchise, ignorance, despotism, extinguished, western hemisphere, individual calamity, physical, intellectual and eternal interests, conflagration, immolated and terrestrial citadel of crime. It was little wonder that the small brands whom he was seeking to pluck from the burning fires of intemperance toppled over in slumber, until the banner class in the southwest corner alone reared its sleepless head. At the close of his address he called to all to come forward and sign the pledge. No one came forward.—Washington Post.

How Conkling Soothed Thurman.

The Buffalo Commercial recalls how the friendship between Judge Thurman and Mr. Conkling was cemented by Mr. Conkling's celebrated retort courteous, which lives as a tradition in the Senate among the historic amenities. Judge Thurman once in the Senate was making a speech on a constitutional question. Mr. Conkling interrupted him several times, which angered the old gentleman, who was prone to let his temper have the upper hand. Facing Mr. Conkling, he roared out: "Does the Senator from New York expect me to answer him every time he turns towards me?" Everybody expected an explosion of wrath on Mr. Conkling's part—instead of which, rising with the utmost dignity, he replied: "When I turn towards the Senator from Ohio, I turn to him as the Mussulman does towards Mecca. I turn to him as I would to the English common law—to the world's most copious fountain of human jurisprudence." Judge Thurman was completely conquered. He delights in telling the story. He also said very often, "Conkling is mighty good company when he chooses."

The Currant Worm.

The best known remedy for the currant worm, which infests both currant and gooseberry bushes, is white hellebore. Now, white hellebore is an altogether different drug from black hellebore, so remember and use the former. The cheapest and easiest mode of application is to mix the hellebore in water. Place a heaping tablespoonful of the powder in a dish; add gradually a quart of boiling water, stirring all the while to make certain that the hellebore is thoroughly saturated. Turn this mixture into a pailful of cold water, stir well and apply with a garden syringe or ordinary watering pot. The object is to wet every leaf; make two applications, a few days apart. While white hellebore is poisonous, there is little or no danger from its use, as above directed. The chances are that before the fruit is ripe enough to eat the rains will have washed off all traces of the hellebore, and should any remain on the clusters the fruit will present a soiled appearance and be rejected in consequence.

Freaks of the Storm.

Wind-rolled snowballs are often seen on the Dakota and Wyoming prairies. Sometimes millions upon millions of the balls are in sight at one time. Many are of the size of an orange, some as big as a cannon ball, while others reach the proportions of the prize pumpkin of the county fair. These freaks of the storm leave a person under the fanciful impression that great armies of school boys have been battling over the snowy space.—New York Star.

A Simple Cure for Toothache.

It is well known that toothache is often caused by a disordered stomach, and is often removed by a simple aperient. Grey powder proves useful in many forms of toothache, and is regarded by many dentists as one of the best remedies for this complaint. It proves of most value when the pain is gnawing, tearing, or boring in character, and when it is temporarily relieved by cold water. It is of value when the pain affects the entire side of the head, extending upwards to the head and backwards to the ears. In many cases it is a good plan to introduce a small quantity of grey powder into the hollow of the decayed tooth.

An English Investment.

An Englishman has invented a brake by which any person in a compartment car can turn a lever and stop the train. At the same time a white disk will appear outside of the compartment to notify the conductor in which carriage the brake has been used.—Boston Budget.

Chun Ling, a Chinaman, was received into membership of the fashionable Immanuel Baptist Church, in Chicago, a few nights ago. He is the first Chinaman to be united with the Baptist denomination in Chicago, although the Methodists number several Mongolians among their members in that city, and one belongs to the Presbyterian Church.

The only medicine for woman's peculiar ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded, is DR. PIERCE'S FAVORITE PRESCRIPTION. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrappers, and faithfully carried out for many years.

THE OUTGROWTH OF A VAST EXPERIENCE.

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

A BOON TO WOMEN. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar diseases.

A POWERFUL TONIC. As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the uterus, or womb and its appendages, in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic. It promotes digestion and assimilation of food, cures nausea, weakness of stomach, indigestion, bloating and eructations of gas.

A SOOTHING NERVINE. As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

A MOTHER'S CORDIAL. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system.

In pregnancy, "Favorite Prescription" is a "mother's cordial," relieving nausea, weakness of stomach and other distressing symptoms common to that condition. If its use is kept up in the latter months of gestation, it so prepares the system for delivery as to greatly lessen, and many times almost entirely do away with the sufferings of that trying ordeal.

CURES THE WORST CASES. "Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhœa, or "whites," excessive flowing at monthly periods, painful menstruation, unnatural suppression, prolapsus or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation, and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

FOR THE KIDNEYS. "Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

TREATING THE WRONG DISEASE.

Many times women call on their family physicians, suffering, as they imagine, one from dyspepsia, another from heart disease, another from liver or kidney disease, another from nervous exhaustion, or prostration, another with pain here or there, and in this way they all present alike to themselves and their easy-going and indifferent, or over-busy doctor, separate and distinct diseases, for which he prescribes his pills and potions, assuming them to be such, when, in reality, they are all only symptoms caused by some womb disorder. The physician, ignorant of the cause of suffering, encourages his practice until large bills are made. The suffering patient gets no better, but probably worse by reason of the delay, wrong treatment and consequent complications. A proper medicine, like DR. PIERCE'S FAVORITE PRESCRIPTION, directed to the cause, would have entirely removed the disease, thereby dispelling all those distressing symptoms, and instituting comfort instead of prolonged misery.

3 PHYSICIANS FAILED. Mrs. E. F. MORGAN, of No. 71 Lexington St., East Boston, Mass., says: "Five years ago I was a dreadful sufferer from uterine troubles. Having exhausted the skill of three physicians, I was completely discouraged, and so weak I could with difficulty cross the room alone. I began taking Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and using the local treatment recommended in his 'Common Sense Medical Adviser.' I commenced to improve at once. In three months I was perfectly cured, and have had no trouble since. I wrote a letter to my family paper, briefly mentioning how my health had been restored, and offering to send the full particulars to any one writing me for them, and enclosing a stamped envelope for reply. I have received over four hundred letters. In reply, I have described my case and the treatment used, and have earnestly advised them to 'do likewise.' From a great many I have received second letters of thanks, stating that they had commenced the use of 'Favorite Prescription,' had sent the $1.50 required for the 'Medical Adviser,' and had applied the local treatment so fully and plainly laid down therein, and were much better already."

A VOICE FROM CALIFORNIA. Mrs. ED. M. CAMPBELL, of Oakland, California, writes: "I had been troubled all my life with hysterical attacks and paroxysms, or spasms, and periodical recurrences of severe headache, but since I have been using your 'Favorite Prescription' I have had none of these. I also had womb complaint so bad that I could not walk two blocks without the most severe pain, but before I had taken your 'Favorite Prescription' two months, I could walk all over the city without inconvenience. All my troubles seem to be leaving me under the benign influence of your medicine, and I now feel smarter than for years before. My physicians told me that I could not be cured, and therefore you will please accept my everlasting thanks for what you have done for me, and may God bless you in your good works."

Later, she writes: "It is now four years since I took your 'Favorite Prescription,' and I have had no return of the female trouble I had then."

Retroverted Womb.—Mrs. EVA KOHLER, of Crab Orchard, Neb., writes: "Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has done me a great deal of good. I suffered from retroversion of the uterus, for which I took two bottles of the 'Favorite Prescription,' and I am now feeling like a different woman."

Doctors Failed. Mrs. F. CORWIN, of Post Creek, N. Y., writes: "I doctored with three or four of the best doctors in these parts, and I grew worse until I wrote to you and began using your 'Favorite Prescription.' I used three bottles of it and two of the 'Golden Medical Discovery,' also one and a half bottles of the 'Purgative Pellets.' I can do my work and sew and walk all I care to, and am in better health than I ever expected to be in this world again. I owe it all to your wonderful medicines."

Well as I Ever Was.—Mrs. JOHN STEWART, of Chippewa Falls, Wis., writes: "I wish to inform you that I am as well as I ever was, for which I thank your medicines. I took four bottles of the 'Favorite Prescription' and one bottle of your 'Discovery' and four bottles of the 'Pellets.' All of the bad symptoms have disappeared. I do all my own work: am able to be on my feet all day. My friends tell me I never looked so well."

THE PIOUS PARSEES.

Worthy Subjects of Queen Victoria—A Long-Drawn-Out Wedding.

Though the Parsees do not number more than 9,000 souls, and half of them are in Bombay, they are wielding a decided influence in the modern civilization of the east. Long a persecuted race, they were finally driven from their native country 1,100 years ago by the Moslems and settled in Sugat, and from that point have become scattered through India. By their fruits they are making themselves known as worthy and efficient members of society. The Queen of England has no more honorable and patriotic subjects in England. They must have a deal of that noble blood of the ancient Persian coursing their veins. They own and occupy some of the best residences in Bombay. It is refreshing to visit their homes after seeing so many wretched ones in this country. I felt it fortunate to witness a wedding party just at sunset, led by a band of music to the temple in which the ceremony was to take place. There were as many as 100 in all. The men were attired in their white, loose togas, and the women in their rich silks of striking colors, with the snowy band round the head crowned with the sari of violet or rose, sea-green or sapphire. The Zoroastrian youth were present with bright faces and glossiest, black, flowing hair. The whole ceremony would not be finished till 4 o'clock in the morning. The wedding knot should be strongly tied in that time. Divorces very seldom occur among the Parsees.—Bombay Letter.

Consumption Curable.

It cannot be too often impressed on every one that the much dreaded consumption (which is only lung scrofula), is curable, if attended to at once, and that the primary symptoms, so often mistaken as signs of diseased lungs, are only symptoms of an unhealthy liver. To this organ the system is indebted for pure blood, and to pure blood the lungs are indebted no less than to pure air for healthy action. If the former is polluted, we have the hacking cough, the hectic flush, night-sweats, and a whole train of symptoms resembling consumption. Rouse the liver to healthy action by the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, take healthy exercise, live in the open air, and all symptoms of consumption will disappear. For weak lungs, spitting of blood, shortness of breath, chronic nasal catarrh, bronchitis, asthma, severe coughs, and kindred affections, it is a most wonderful remedy.

Dr. Charles Gross, of Troy, N.Y., has accepted the chair in history at Harvard College. Dr. Gross is now in London and will return to the United States shortly.

The Pineapple Season.

The pineapple season is now open. This fruit begins to arrive early in April, but the quantity is small until toward the end of the month. Merchants here are now receiving 3,500 barrels a week, and by the middle of May, when the season is at its height, the quantity will reach 10,000 barrels a week. The barrels contain from 25 to 30 extra large "pines," or 40 to 60 smaller ones. The season lasts from April until August, and about 5,000,000 pineapples are imported each year. The bulk of the crop comes to this city, which is the principal distributing point for the United States. The first arrivals came from Havana. They are a little later than usual this year. The island of Cuba is one of the chief sources of supply. Pineapples ripen early there. After the first week in May the Bahama pineapples arrive, and those from Central America soon follow.—N.Y. Mail and Express.

Johnny's Definition.

Johnny—Mamma. Is it bigamy for a man to have two or three wives at the same time?

Mamma—Yes, my dear.

Johnny—Then it is smallamy when he has only got one?—Washington Critic.

They Pay $500, or Cure.

For many years the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, who are thoroughly responsible, financially, have offered in good faith, through nearly every newspaper in the land, a standing reward of $500 for a case of nasal catarrh, no matter how bad, or of how long standing, which they cannot cure. The remedy is sold by druggists at only 50 cents. It is mild, soothing, cleansing, deodorizing, antiseptic and healing.

A Hasty Bite of Luncheon.

Customer (to waiter)—Here, John, take my order. Beef soup, cup of coffee, roast lamb, baked beans, onions, tomatoes, cucumbers, mince pie—an' be spry about it my train leaves in just six minutes.

The Opinion of All

Who have tried Polson's NERVILINE, the great pain remedy, is that it is never-failing in pain of every description. Neuralgia, toothache, cramps, pain in the stomach and kindred complaints are banished as if by magic. Rapid and certain in operation, pleasant to take, Nerviline stands at the very front rank of remedies of this class. A trial bottle may be purchased for 10c., a very small amount in any case; but the best expenditure you can make, if a sufferer from any kind of pain, is a 10 or 25 cent bottle of Nerviline at druggists and country dealers.

ITCHING PILES.

SYMPTOMS.—Moisture; intense itching and stinging, most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form, which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It is equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT can be obtained of druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

A Faithful Servant.

Dame—"Horrors, Jane! why in the world do you put such water as this on the table? Why don't you filter it?"

Domestic—"Sure, mum, the water that muddy now it ud ruin the filter."

Asleep on the Railroad Track.

A little child, tired of play, had pillowed his head on a rail and fallen asleep. The train was almost upon him when a passing stranger rushed forward and saved him from a horrible death. Perhaps you are asleep on the track, too. You are, if you are neglecting the biliousness and constipation which trouble you, in the hope that you will "come all right." Wake up, or the train will be upon you! Constipation is too often the forerunner of a general "breaking up." Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets will regulate your liver, stomach and bowels, and restore your system to its normal condition.

Judges are weary with calling attention to drink as the principal cause of crime, but I cannot refrain from saying that if they could make England sober they would shut up nine-tenths of the prisons.—Lord Chief Justice Coleridge o, England.

An Omission.

A Dundalk correspondent says:—The item in the Herald last week, in reference to the social held at Mr. Dean's, was not complete. There was a very important omission made by the writer. He forgot to tell Herald readers about the gentleman who lost his hat, and who expressed indignation that any person could have been so stupid as to take it, when the word "Donkey" was written inside as "plain as the nose on your face." Mr. Spurr is a racy and able writer, but his item would have been much spicier than it was had it contained the addition I have mentioned.

Lenore.

Her heart was like a rose-bud sweet
That opens in the sun,
For love drew out its folded leaves
To wither, one by one.

In silence and in sadness, she
Pressed oft that little heart,
Low pleading to be loved again
Or else with life to part.

That life had been a mixture strange
Of darkness and of light,
But soon the brightness was eclipsed
By sombre clouds of night.

She was not grand, nor brave, nor strong—
She drooped her little head,
And from her oft-times tear-wet cheek
Too soon the rose-flush fled.

There came a day when no more pain
Would tear her tender breast:
"I loved him so," was all she said,
"I loved him,—let me rest."

One little hand was closed about
A paper white and small;
They looked—h[illegible] name was written there—
His name, e[illegible] that was all.

She was not grand, nor brave, nor strong—
She drooped her weary head
And loved ones whispered o'er her form:
"She loved him—she is dead."

Sunday Services.

The importance of present salvation and the danger of neglecting to attend to the immortal interests of the soul were beautifully set forth by Mr. Small, a student from Knox College, Toronto, in the Presbyterian church on Sunday last. The earnest and practical manner in which the speaker dealt with his subject secured the marked attention of his numerous hearers.

In the evening, Rev. J. W. Shilton, B. A., delivered a stirring sermon in the Methodist church. Theme: "Our Future State." The sermon abounded in thoughtful expressions and practical applications, and was delivered in that earnest, forcible manner, so characteristic of this eloquent and gifted preacher.

The Baby Village Heard From.

The Sports Committee of Markdale advertised a Lacrosse Match between Flesherton and Markdale teams, to be played at the latter place on the 24th for a prize of $5. The Secretary of our Lacrosse team wrote the Secretary of the Sports Committee for information as they had not been consulted about the match, and received a reply that none but juveniles from Flesherton would be allowed to compete with their team. This is just in keeping with the baby village. But why do they advertise a match and then debar our team? Was it to give a show of respectability to their sports? Our Lacrosse team and many of our citizens intended going to Markdale on the 24th but this means "stay away" and many will do so, as our team will not be allowed to play. However, it is just as might have been expected. The "Hustlers," afraid of getting badly whipped, resorted to the flunking act as a means of escape.

Carried Unanimously.

At a meeting of the Quarterly Official Board of the Methodist Church, Flesherton circuit, the following motion was put and carried unanimously;—

Moved by J. W. Armstrong, seconded by A. R. Fawcett, That this Quarterly Official Board desire to record their gratitude to the Great Head of the Church for His presence in giving to us peace and prosperity during the conference year now coming to a close. We desire also to record our very high appreciation of the life and labor of our esteemed Superintendent, Rev. J. W. Shilton, B. A., whose administration of our church laws we heartily endorse, and whose earnest and faithful labors are so acceptable to our people. We deem it quite superfluous to invite him to remain on this circuit, as we take it for granted that he will surely do so, and that the Stationing Committee will certainly not think of disturbing his present relation.

The above is also endorsed in a most hearty manner by the people generally, by whom Rev. Mr. Shilton is held in the highest respect and esteem.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

CHAPTER XXXI.

The night passed quietly, and the morning broke fair and cloudless, but with the same heavy sultriness in the air which had made Captain Layton prognosticate a storm. There was not a breath of air stirring; the sea lay like a vast smooth lake, not even a wavelet disturbing its calm; there was no sunshine, no freshness—nothing but sultry heat, which made people feel oppressed and languid against their will.

"I wish there would be a storm or something," Lady Eastwell said pettishly, as they sat at breakfast, with all doors and windows open to try to produce a draught, but in vain. "It is unbearably hot."

"Don't wish for a storm, Lady Eastwell," said Major Stuart, smiling. "Remember that I shall be exposed to all its fury."

"Why, are you really going on to-day?"

"Yes, really."

"Cannot we induce you to give us another day, Major Stuart," said Mrs. Beaudesert coquettishly.

"You are very kind, Mrs. Beaudesert; but I fear, if I stay here any longer, I shall feel my solitariness too deeply by and by."

"But why leave us at all?" pursued the little widow, looking very charming in her dainty primrose morning-dress.

"A wise man does not seek danger, Mrs. Beaudesert."

"But only a coward flies from it," she replied gayly.

"'Discretion is the better part of valor.'"

"You, a soldier, to preach such a creed as that! For shame, Major Stuart! Captain Layton, what do you say?"

"I think Stuart is very wise," said the young man in a rather sullen tone, still angry with the pretty coquette for her neglect of the previous evening. "I have half a mind to go with him."

"But I promised to take you to church on Sunday, Captain Layton," Shirley said brightly from her seat by Sir Hugh. "Have you forgotten?"

"I had," he answered frankly. "Thank you for reminding me, Lady Glynn. But to-day is only Wednesday. How am I to exist until Sunday?"

"If you are very well behaved, I will take you with me to call at the Vicarage this afternoon," she replied slowly.

"Lady Glynn, how can I thank you? I could say with perfect truth I adore——"

"My dear fellow," said Sir Hugh, laughing; "if I hear a man saying that he adores my wife I shall have to break his head."

"Thanks for shutting me up in time," said Captain Layton, smiling. "Lady Glynn must take my adoration for granted. Will you really take me to the Vicarage this afternoon?"

"I will indeed. I promised to go hear some more songs, and I will take you, if you will give me your word that you will behave with the greatest decorum."

"I do," said the young man solemnly. "I will pay the greatest attention to the mother, and forget how to flirt for the occasion."

"I cannot think what you see in those insipid girls, Shirley," remarked Lady Eastwell languidly. "They are not a bit pretty, and have not a notion of dress."

"Have you seen much of them, Lady Eastwell?" asked Guy quietly. "Ah, I thought not—because, if you had, you would not call them insipid! I am afraid I am not a very good judge; but I must say that I have rarely met nicer girls, so thoroughly unaffected and charming."

"Don't you think you had better stay and accompany Lady Glynn and Captain Layton this afternoon?" said Mrs. Beaudesert gayly. "There seems to be quite a furor about these charming damsels; but I must acknowledge that I saw nothing very attractive in them."

"Perhaps not," returned Guy, smiling. "We look at things from a different point of view, Mrs Beaudesert."

"Then you will stay?"

"Thank you—no."

"Not even to call at the Vicarage?"

"Not even to call at the Vicarage," he answered, smiling. "I hope to be at Lynmouth to-night. The vicar there was my tutor for some time."

"Has he any daughters?" asked Mrs. Beaudesert innocently.

"No, he is an old bachelor, like myself," said Guy, laughing.

"And a misogynist," asked the pretty widow, "like yourself?"

"Like myself, too, not a misogynist," said Major Stuart, glancing at her with a smile, "but a devoted admirer of your sex, Mrs. Beaudesert. Have you made up your mind to walk a few miles over the cliffs with me, Glynn?" he added, turning to the baronet.

"Yes, I think so," Sir Hugh answered, hesitating a little. "Does your way lie over the cliffs?"

"Yes, Lymouth is about eighteen or twenty miles, I fancy."

"A long walk alone," put in Lord Rupert somewhat contemptuously.

"One cannot feel one's solitude much in such scenery as this," said Hugh quietly. "The coast is most beautiful, and I have very pleasant recollections of some walking tours I made in my boyhood."

"Don't tempt Sir Hugh into sharing your wandering existence," advised Lady Eastwell, with a glance at Sir Hugh, who smiled as his eyes rested on his wife, looking so fair and sweet in her white dress, with a softened, almost tender expression on the face which had been for so ongso proud and cold.

"There is no fear of that," he answered, smiling; "although I think a ramble would do me good. We are terribly lazy here. Shirley, may I look you up at the Vicarage on my return?"

"I wonder, Shirley, you are not afraid to trust him to the fascinations of these attractive demoiselles," said Alice, with a little smile which had not much sweetness in it.

"I will risk that," Shirley answered gayly; and half an hour afterward she was standing with Mrs. Beaudesert and Lady Eastwell on the balcony, chatting merrily as they watched the gentlemen, who were smoking their cigars at the door below, where Major Stuart and Sir Hugh stood ready to start.

"What a curious walking-stick that is of yours, Stuart?" Lord Rupert said. "Don't you find it heavy?"

"Heavy?" Guy questioned lightly. "No; it is bamboo, as you see."

"But it is loaded, is it not?" said his lordship, taking it into his hand.

"No, that top is silver," answered Major Stuart. "It was made out of a lump of silver ore which a friend brought home from South America. It was of course much larger than that, but when the lead had been removed the silver made that ball."

"It would deal a pretty heavy blow," remarked Captain Layton, examining it.

"Yes; it would kill a man if it came sharply in contact with his temple," said Guy, laughing. "It is an old friend and companion of mine, and I rarely travel without it. If you are ready, Glynn, we will start."

"I am quite ready," Sir Hugh answered, glancing up at the balcony and raising his cap, with a loving look in his blue eyes. "I will join you at the Vicarage, Shirley."

"Very well." She looked down at him with a smile, then over at Guy, who smiled also as he met the lovely hazel eyes.

"Give us your flowers, Shirley?" her husband said lightly. "Let us adorn ourselves."

Shirley smiled again as she took from the lace of her morning-dress two roses, one a deep damask rose, the other a pure white one, and dropped them over the balcony into her husband's hands.

"Rival roses," said Mrs. Beaudesert, as she watched Sir Hugh, who having given Guy the white rose, was fastening the red one in the button-hole of his gray tweed coat. "York and Lancaster! That is ominous, Sir Hugh."

"Why?" said Sir Hugh, laughing.

"'Hath not thy rose a canker, Somerset?'"

"'Hath not thy rose a thorn, Plantagenet?'" quoted Lady Eastwell gayly.

"Don t fall out by the way," said Mrs. Beaudesert merrily. "It would be the worse for you, Sir Hugh, because, if Major Stuart has the same argument that Somerset had in his scabbard in that silver ball at the end of his stick, you will certainly have the worst of it."

"What argument was that?" Sir Hugh asked absently: he seemed to find Shirley's graceful figure in her white dress prettier than the little widow in her primrose satin-faced morning wrapper.

"Don't you remember?" she asked gayly. "I should have thought you read Shakspeare sometimes. Have you forgotten that charming scene in the Temple Gardens when they choose the roses? The Plantagenet asks Somerset where is his argument."

'And Somerset answers," Lady Eastwell broke in, smiling—

> Here in my scabbard, meditating that > Shall dye your white rose in a bloody red.'

'Ah, but I have the red rose already!" Sir Hugh said laughingly. "So I can defy Stuart."

"Yes, possession is nine points of the law" remarked Lady Eastwell, with some meaning. "And so farewell," she added, smiling, "until I see you again."

"I hope we shall meet this autumn, Major Stuart," said Mrs Beaudesert graciously. "I dare say we shall be visiting at the same houses."

"I may even look forward perhaps to the great pleasure of seeing you at Stuartleigh," he replied, lifting his hat with the grave graceful courtesy that Shirley had liked so much in the old days.

"Farewell, Lady Eastwell. Good-bye, Lady Glynn."

His voice changed a little when he spoke to her, changed and softened so that to Shirley's ears the simple word he had spoken carried its full meaning. He was going away; but he was leaving her a less unhappy—she could not say happier yet—and a better woman; and her lips quivered a little as she said "Good-bye," and she remembered that once in the old days they had spoken of the meaning of that word.

"Good-bye," she answered softly, little thinking, as she watched the two men walk away down the street side by side, turning at the foot of the hill to lift their hats once more with a last gesture of farewell, how soon and in what terrible circumstances she would meet Guy Stuart again.

"I am very sorry, Mrs. Grey; but I think that at last we must make up our minds to tear ourselves away."

Lady Glynn was standing by the window of the Vicarage drawing-room, a pretty, shabby, homelike room with a glimpse of sea visible from its bay-windows, and old china bowls placed here and there with roses of every hue, which filled the room with fragrance. The piano was open, and Ada was seated before it, turning over a pile of songs, over which Captain's smooth dark head was also bent. Lucie was standing with Shirley at the window, where they had been talking earnestly and pleasantly for half an hour and more, while Mrs. Grey had been away, occupied with a humble visitor in her husband's study. The tea-tray, with its simple white china cups and saucers, stood on a little table, and Shirley had felt amused at the eagerness with which Frederic Layton had accepted a cup of the beverage which at other times he so heartily despised, and how pleasant and natural and agreeable the usually so languid and affected young man had been under the influence of the pretty gentle girls and the sweet gray-haired woman whose name, "the mother," seemed to fit her so well.

"It has been very kind of you to come," Mrs. Grey said. "The girls were looking forward to your visit."

"It is very kind of you to receive us so cordially," responded Shirley, in her soft voice. "May I come again sometimes? I will try not to be too troublesome, but if you knew what a pleasure your daughters' society is Mrs. Grey!"

"Whenever you come, we shall be only too glad to see you," said Mrs. Grey, with the simplicity and frankness of perfect breeding. "And you could not be troublesome, Lady Glynn."

"Thank you." Shirley answered gratefully, with a cordial pressure of her hostess's hand. "Captain Layton, I am afraid that, if we are to be received at the Vicarage again, we must take our departure now."

Captain Layton's smooth dark head was lifted with a start.

"Already?" he said reproachfully. "Why, Lady Glynn, you were to wait here for Sir Hugh!"

"Sir Hugh has probably returned too tired to follow us," she answered, smiling. "Have you any idea how long we have been here?"

"About half an hour, I should say," the young fellow answered, so ruefully that Shirley laughed outright.

"Only two hours and a half!" she said merrily. "Good-bye, Lucie—I may call you so, may I not? Shall we go for our ramble to-morrow afternoon?"

"I shall be delighted, Lady Glynn. Shall I call for you?"

"Will it be on the way? Yes, then do, dear. Please, Mrs. Grey, you will spare her to me as often as you can, will you not, while we are here?"

The girls walked down with them to the wicket gate which opened on to the road, Shirley and Lucie in front, Captain Layton and Ada lingering a little behind; and at the wicket-gate they parted, the young officer bestowing an unconscionably long and lingering pressure on Ada's hand ere he relinquished it.

"The rain is just beginning," Lucie said quickly. "You must have a cloak and umberella, Lady Glynn."

"We shall get home before it comes on," Shirley told her gayly. "Good-bye until to-morrow?"

"Lady Glynn," Captain Layton said, in a hesitating manner, as they walked on rapidly, for the rain had already begun to fall in slow but heavy drops; "may I accompany you to-morrow?"

"Ah!" she said, smiling. "Was I right when I said that they were nice girls?"

"Right? I should think so!" exclaimed the captain. "They are the nicest girls I have ever seen."

"Warm praise," Shirley said dryly. "Are you serious?"

"I never was more so in my life," he answered warmly.

"Captain Layton"—Shirley turned to him earnestly—"I should never forgive myself if through me any shadow was to fall upon that happy home."

The young man's face flushed slightly, but his eyes met hers earnestly and frankly.

"I understand," he said quietly. "You need not be afraid, Lady Glynn. I think any man, whatever his rank, would be fortunate to win such a wife as Ada Grey; and my rank is not very exalted, although I am quite rich enough to marry a girl without a sou."

"A poor clergyman's daughter?" Shirley said gently.

"Yes—if she will have me," he answered, flushing.

"Very well," Lady Glynn said, smiling; "I will trust you, Captain Layton. We are just home in time," she added; and, as they reached the stone porch of the "Pack of Cards," the rain fell in torrents, and a clap of thunder, which made Shirley utter a faint cry of alarm, seemed to shake the little town as it echoed from cliff to cliff.

"Has Sir Hugh returned?" she asked a servant who was in the entrance hall.

"I do not think so, my lady," he answered; "I will inquire."

"Never mind; I will see myself," Shirley rejoined, as she went upstairs, to find that Sir Hugh had not yet arrived home, that Lady Eastwell was in her room with a bad headache, and that the sitting-room was in possession of Lord Rupert and Mrs. Beaudesert, the pretty widow being "terrified to death" at the thunder, and requiring all Lord Rupert's manly protection to reassure her.

Shirley, with a curling lip, quietly went up to her own room, and stood with dreamy eyes at the window watching the lightning. She was not generally nervous about storms; but this one, coming so suddenly, as it were, startled her, and she was anxious about her husband and Guy. Was the latter still on his way to Lynmouth, she wondered, or had he reached his destination? Sir Hugh was in all probability near home, and had taken shelter in a cottage.

The storm continued, and increased greatly in violence as the evening wore on. Dinner was served in a closely shuttered and curtained room; but it was quite impossible to shut out the storm entirely. A kind of depression hung over the little party which had been so gay the night before.

Alice did not appear—during a storm she always suffered from a nervous attack—and Mrs. Beaudesert's terror was so great that before the meal was half over Shirley urged her to leave the table and lie quietly down in her own room, and then, after a minute or two, led her, trembling and on the verge of hysterics, away.

While the gentlemen drew their chairs up round the table and wondered "what the deuce had become of Glynn," Shirley herself, more and more anxious as the hours wore on and no tidings of her husband reached her, sat by Mrs. Beaudesert's sofa and tried to soothe the poor terrified little woman, whose pretty affectations completely failed her now, and who clung to Shirley, trembling, laughing, and sobbing hysterically until she was exhausted to faintness.

It was well for Shirley Glynn that she had something to occupy her attention and keep her thoughts away from the terrible visions which persisted in recurring to her mind of the evils which might have beset Sir Hugh on his homeward way, the dangerous cliff paths, rendered so slippery with rain, and his want of familiarity with the neighborhood all adding considerably to the perils of the storm. She could not drive the visions quite away; she tried however to dismiss her fears as groundless, as she placed Mrs. Beaudesert gently back upon her cushions and went to summon her maid. But the pretty Frenchwoman had followed her mistress's example, and was "going from one faint to another," one of the servants said, and Shirley, rather impatient of such want of self-control, went back to her patient and asked her to undress and get into bed. The poor little widow was too exhausted by her hysterical emotion to resist, and Lady Glynn was almost alarmed at her faintness and prostration, which made the disrobing process a long and difficult one. But at last it was accomplished, and the poor little trembling figure laid back upon the pillows, looking very unlike the brilliant little coquette of a few hours before.

"There—perhaps you will sleep now," Lady Glynn said soothingly. "But you seem so faint that I think I must get you some wine."

"No, no, do not leave me, I shall die of terror!" moaned Mrs. Beaudesert. "Oh, how terrible, how terrible!"

It was indeed terrible. Shirley trembled from head to foot as peal after peal of thunder and vivid, awful flashes of lightning succeeded each other almost without intermission. Mrs. Beaudesert clung to her in an agony of alarm, too frightened even to scream, until suddenly a shriek, so wild and piercing that it was heard above the din of the storm, rang through the house; and Shirley started to her feet, startled, awed, and trembling.

"Let me go; I must see what has happened," she said hastily, trying to disengage herself from the clinging hands.

"No, no," Mrs. Beaudesert tried to say; but her terror mastered her, and she sunk back in a dead faint upon her pillows as Shirley went, as fast as her trembling limbs could carry her, out of the room, along the passage, and down the stairs.

A group of men, gentlemen, servants, and a couple of fishermen were standing together in the entrance hall, forming a circle around something which Shirley could not see, and on the faces of every one present was an expression of awe and shocked distress. As the sound of her light footfall broke the stillness, one of the servants looked up, and the horror deepened on his face as he saw her.

"No, no, my lady," he said hurriedly, "do not come. For Heaven's sake, sir, do not let her come."

Captain Layton detached himself from the group and turned toward Shirley, going to her like a man in a dream.

"Let me take you to your room," he said mechanically. "This is no place for you, Lady Glynn."

"What has happened?" Shirley asked faintly, looking up at him with startled questioning eyes; but, before he could answer another gentleman detached himself from the group and came toward her, his hands held out, and an intense compassion on his face.

"Oh, poor child!" he said very gently, thinking of the awful blow in store for the beautiful young creature of whom his daughter had spoken so enthusiastically; and Shirley put her hands in his, looking wistfully at the gentle compassionate face with eyes like Lucie's

"What is it?" she inquired faintly; and, as she pressed forward, the group parted a little amid a sudden awful hush, and Shirley saw, lying still and motionless, with its face covered, a recumbent figure—a figure with a red rose, faded now, in the breast of its light gray coat, and an emerald ring on one nerveless hand. She looked at it in silence for one brief moment; then, with a little gasping sob, she put both her hands to her bosom, and Mr. Grey caught her as she fell.

CHAPTER XXXII.

"Lucie, don't you think it is almost time for it to be over now?"

"Dear Lady Glynn, it is not late yet," Lucie Grey answered sorrowfully.

"Don't call me that, Lucie," Shirley said, rather irritably.

"Forgive me," the vicar's daughter returned gently, looking with very sympathizing eyes at the slender prostrate figure upon the couch in the little shabby low-ceiled sitting-room adjoining Shirley's bedroom at the "Pack of Cards," and thinking how terribly she was changed within the last forty-eight hours.

As she lay back against the dark red cushions of the couch, Shirley Glynn looked more like a dead woman than a living, breathing one; her face was as colorless as the white wrapper that she wore, there were deep dark circles round the heavy lusterless eyes, and her little hands lay helplessly beside her.

"Lucie, could you help me to the window?" she said presently. "I feel so stifled here."

"It would be better for you to lie quiet, dear," answered Lucie, gently, dreading lest she should see the crowd which had assembled round the inn, waiting eagerly for the conclusion of the coroner's inquest which was being held at that moment. "Let me fan you, Shirley."

"Is it not strange"—Lady Glynn looked up into Lucie's face with a wistful glance—"that all my strength should have left me so suddenly? Lucie, I wonder if I am dying?"

"Dying? Of course not!" said Lucie cheerily, in spite of her trembling lips. "Such a terrible shock as you have had was enough to make you feel weak. Let me lift you a little, dear, while I arrange your cushions."

"Poor Hugh—oh, poor Hugh!" Shirley moaned feebly. "Lucie, it makes me so glad and happy now to think that we were friends. We were not always friends," she went on, in her faint broken tones. "I had been hard and cold and unforgiving for years; but the night before—only the night before—we forgave each other. Do you know, Lucie, that at first I did not think it could be Hugh lying there?" she went on, after a pause, her eyes dilating with horror as she pictured the body of her husband as it had lain prone and motionless in the centre of the group. "The hand, although it wore his ring, did not seem like his hand; but it was all so confused in my brain, you know, and I could not see clearly, and they would not let me look upon his face."

"It was altered beyond all recognition," Lucie said gently. "Dear, try to rest."

"It must have been a terrible fall. Poor Hugh! He was so handsome! Jack, my brother, thought him so handsome. Oh, I am so glad," she added pitifully, "that I had forgiven him, Lucie!" She lifted her hands and covered her face with a cry of horror. "Only a few weeks before I had wished I could kill him! It was Guy who told me how wicked I had been. He made me forgive Hugh. Lucie, did I fancy it—I fancy so many strange things now my head is so weak—or has Guy come?"

"Major Stuart is here, dear," Miss Grey shrunk a little as she spoke. She was dreading always lest Shirley should ask some question she could not answer.

"Why did he come?"

"It was necessary that he should be present."

"I wonder why? He was not with him when he fell, or he would have come back. Oh, Lucie, I wonder if he was killed at once," she added, struggling up among the pillows, with wild eyes and panting breath, "or if he lay there dying all through the storm?"

Then she fell back again, with the horror deepening on her face. Lucie knelt down and took the trembling slender form and hushed it gently in her arms.

"He died at once and painlessly, Shirley," she said through the tears which fell thickly on the soft hair which lay upon her breast. "Try not to think of it, darling."

"How can I help thinking of it?" Shirley asked wearily. "All night long it haunts me—all night—and it prevents me from sleeping, and I feel sometimes as if I must shriek out with horror. Do you think—"

She lifted her head suddenly and looked at the tearful face. "You are crying, Lucie; I felt a tear upon my hand! I will not distress you again. Oh, I wish I could cry, Lucie!"

"My poor darling!"

"Guy called me that," she said dreamily, "long ago—so long ago! That scene haunts me too, Lucie, in the night. You do not know of that, and I will not speak of it now, because he is dead—poor Hugh, poor Hugh! Oh, my heart!"

"What is it, dear? Are you in pain?" Lucie Grey asked gently, as she saw the quick movement of the frail little hands.

A MONSTER IRON SHIP.

Her Mainmast Rises 300 Feet Above Her Deck—Three Other Masts.

At Brooklyn lies the four-masted ship Palgrave, of Port Glasgow. She is the largest iron sailing vessel in the world and one of the handsomest. Beneath her iron decks is stowed 6,711 tons of cargo brought from Calcutta in 106 days. "Why," said Capt. Hugh Harney, "we never took in the sky-sails from the time we set them till we sighted Cape Hatteras, on April 4th. I have been going to sea forty years, and I never heard of such a thing before." The Palgrave measures 322 feet 5 inches from stem to stern. She has 49 feet beam and 25 feet 4 inches depth of hold. With her present cargo of linseed, jute, jute butts, shellac, indigo and hides she draws 23 feet of water aft, or about 22 feet 7 inches mean draught. Her lower masts, topmasts and bowsprit are made of steel. The latter is short, no jibboom being carried on it, and only three head sails are set from it. In addition to five wire shrouds forming the lower rigging there are two cap or masthead shrouds, and also two cap backstays to hold the steel topmasts firmly in place. She carries double topsail and double topgallant yards on each mast, the aftermost mast being called the jigger mast. The sails on this mast are named the jigger, jigger lower topsail, jigger upper topsail, jigger topgallant sail, jigger royal and jigger skysail. The mainyard is of steel, 105 feet long. All other yards except the topgallant sail, royal and skysail are also made of steel. The shrouds and backstays are set up by the turn-buckle process. The crew, numbering forty-two all told, live in the forward part of the poop, or iron deck house, which begins between the main and mizzen masts, and extends aft about fifty feet. With a steam donkey engine, the Palgrave's three-ton anchors are hove up, and her topsail yards masthheaded. From the deck to her main skysail sreak, the highest point, it lacks only a few inches of being 300 feet. She is owned by William Hamilton & Co., of Port Glasgow, where she was launched in 1884. This is her third voyage. Her carrying capacity is enormous.

Origin of Methodism.

The following is from Dr. Eggleston's illustrated historical paper in the May "Century": "About 1679 there sprang up in England what were known as the 'religious societies,' and though a great part of the religious history of England and her colonies in the eighteenth century lay in embryo in that movement, we cannot now tell the name of its originator or the source of his inspirations. It is possible that some stray seed from Spener's pietistic meetings in Germany had been wafted across the channel, but it is more probable that the English societies were indigenous. The members of these obscure associations stirred up one another to devotion, and resorted to the communion of the parish churches in a body. It was the phenomenon so often seen in the world's religious history—ecclesia in ecclesia—a church growing within a church that had lost the power to satisfy the aspirations of the human spirit. About 1691, a dozen years after their beginning, some of these associations came under the reformatory impulse set agoing by the revolution of 1688; and by this means losing their merely pietistic character, they undertook to co-operate for the suppression of the prevalent vices of the time. Three or four years later the hidden leaven of the societies began to make itself felt as a force to be reckoned with, and Queen Mary and Archbishop Tilotson thought it worth while to lend their approval to this new movement, which had grown while sovereigns and prelates slumbered and slept. By 1701 there were twenty allied societies for the reformation of manners in the British islands, besides forty devout societies of the original kind.

"The most conspicuous outgrowth of the devout societies was the Methodist movement of the eighteenth century, though I do not know that the connection has ever before been pointed out. The so-called 'Holy Club,' of Oxford, from which issued the Wesleys and Whitefield, appears to have been merely one of the religious societies which had already flourished for fifty years, and some of which were still in existence thirty years later. From this same familiar model Wesley doubtless borrowed the outlines of the plans that resulted in the more highly organized Methodist societies, out of which in time have come the great Methodist bodies."

Phosphoric Acid in Tuberculosis.

Dr. Grossie reports in the Gazetta Medica, Italiana a number of cases of tuberculosis, in which most successful cures have attended the external use of phosphoric acid. Dr. Grossie was first led to employ it from a consideration of the effects following Kollischer's treatment of local tuberculosis by interstitial injections of a solution of calcium phosphate; he therefore tried local applications of the same solution in ulcers of the leg, and found the result very satisfactory; but, as there were no tubercles in these cases, the action of the remedy necessitated explanation otherwise than by calcification of the tubercles, and phosphoric acid was deemed the active agent. In pursuance of this conclusion he began to treat all of his cases of obstinate ulcer of the leg by local applications of a 10 per cent. solution of strong phosphoric acid in distilled water, the compresses being renewed three or four times a day. The very satisfactory results thus obtained led to trials of the same substance in various tubercular affections, and with great success.

THE OBLIGING LADY BOARDER.

She Just Took Things as She Found Them and Made No Fuss.

"O, I'll not be the least trouble," said the lady boarder, who had wheedled the mistress of a select boarding-house into taking her for six months, although the mistress had said that she never, never would take another woman to board.

"I don't blame you for not wanting to board women," said the lady boarder, while laying off her wrap in her room, "most of them are so troublesome and finicky, but I think you'll find I'm not one of that sort. I just take things as I find them and make no fuss at all. Now I'll just wash my hands, and—O, could you get me a little white castile soap instead of this cocoanut-oil kind?"

"I'll see," said the landlady.

"And about the towels—I never use crash quite so rough as this, and I'd like a Turkish towel on the rack all the time."

"Well."

"Thank you. I'm determined not to be troublesome after I once get settled, and I—don't you think this dressing-case would look better on this side of the room?"

"I don't know."

"Seems to me it would. Supposing you call a servant up and let us see how it will look moved; and while she's here I believe I'll change the bed to the other corner—that is, if you've no objections."

"O, none at all."

"Thank you. I don't really care much, but then—O, would it be too much trouble to have a cup of hot water sent up to my room an hour before each meal? I think it does me good."

"I suppose I can arrange that," says the landlady gloomily.

"Thanks; you are kind. Now, I guess I'll—O, I wonder if there is any hot water in the bath-room? I'd like to run in and just wash out a few little things that I never send to the laundry. And I wonder if I'd be much in the way if I ran down into the kitchen and ironed them when they're dry? I'll not be a bit of trouble.'

'The cook may object," says the landlady, blandly. "I don't mind myself."

"O, I'll get around her easy enough. Trust me for that. I always do out my handkerchiefs and small pieces wherever I board, and I—O, while I think of it, I'd like to mention that I never drink anything but green tea, and if it wouldn't be too much trouble I'd like my bread without a bit of salt in it. Perhaps it's only a notion, but I can't eat salted bread."

"I hardly know how to manage that," says the landlady dubiously.

"O, it's easy enough. When you bake just make one loaf without salt in it. See? I hope you won't take a bit of trouble on my account if I'm sometimes too late for my meals. Sometimes I may be out shopping or may feel a little lazy in the morning and won't get up, but I'll soon find out where things are in the pantry and will just help myself without troubling any one."

This strikes the landlady so dumb that she can say nothing, and the obliging boarder guilelessly rattles on.

"I like hot cakes for breakfast the year round, and, somehow, no kind of steak agrees with me but sirloin. Would you mind ringing for a servant and having her lower the window a little from the top? O, I see the blankets on the bed are white. It's only a foolish notion of mine, but I really prefer red blankets; and I see you have woven-wire springs. Could you as well as not exchange them for the spiral springs? I much prefer them and I——" but the landlady, being new in the business, has gone from the room in a dazed condition of mind, while the lady boarder reduces her wants to writing as they occur to her during the day.—Detroit Free Press.

A Touching Tale from Berlin.

"A charming little scene was," says the German Post, "enacted the other day in front of the Imperial Palace at Charlottenburg. Early in the morning a little girl of about 8 years, dressed in white, appeared in front of the palace, carrying a pretty basket filled with fresh and dewy violets. Somewhat shyly she went up to the guard at the gate, who looked down on the little creature in mute surprise, and said to him: 'Please, Mr. Guard, I have been told to take these flowers to the Emperor.' The soldier sent her to an official in the palace, and here again she repeated her childish request, whereupon one of the officers on duty went out and returned after a few minutes to take the child with him. She was taken into a drawing-room, where the Empress at once appeared. 'My dear child,' she said, evidently touched by the charming picture which presented itself to her, 'the Emperor has not yet got up, but I will give him the beautiful flowers, and he will be very pleased with them.' Then she took the basket, kissed the child, asked her who she was and led her to the door. It appears the little one was the foster-child of a gardener living in a street leading to the palace."

Salvation Army Charity.

A most admirable charity is that of the Salvation Army in London, which has opened a restaurant where a meal may be bought for a farthing. The small coin pays for a bowl of soup or a half loaf of bread, and two farthings secures a cup of coffee or cocoa and a slice of bread and jam. Thus for about two cents a wholesome meal can be bought. Threepence brings meat and potatoes and a halfpenny a dish of rice.—Chicago Herald.

Not as Magnetic as He Had Thought Himself.

"I think I must have overestimated my personal magnetism and popularity," said a badly defeated candidate. "What induced you to think you possessed such qualities?" asked his unsympathetic wife. "Well," he replied, sadly, "my name is Robert, and everybody calls me 'Bob.'"

BRITISH residents in Japan are subscribing for the repair of the grave of Will Adams, a British sailor who was shipwrecked in Japan in the reign of James I., and who lived for many years at the court of Yedo, where he obtained extraordinary influence. His grave was discovered some years ago on the summit of one of the hills overlooking the Government arsenal of Yokosuka, near Yokohama.

ITEMS AT THE CALICO BALL.

The Provost o' Stra'bungo Tells of His Experiences as Napoleon Bonaparte.

(Glasgow Bailie.)

As Provost o' Stra'bungo, I got an invitation tae the Calico Ball—me an' Betty. Betty at ance decided tae go as a Newhaven fishwife. It saved her ony expense buying new things ye see—she jist put on a' the petticoats she had in the hoose, an' got a creel on her back, an' a big mutch on her heid, an' there she wis. Wi me it was different. Lang did I swither, an' much tobacco did I smoke in my ain wee room thinkin' ower the maitter. One nicht the minister cam' in, an' he says, "there is only one character in history that resembles you, Provost."

"An' wha micht that be?" speirs I.

"Napoleon Bonyparty," says he.

"Bonyparty! Oh, but he wis a faur greater man than ever I wis," wis my reply.

"Well, certainly, in a way he was, but there are degrees of greatness, Provost."

"Weel," says I, smoking meditatively up the lum, "nae doot Bonyparty wis a great man, but ye see, minister, he had sensible men tae dale wi'. If he had had a lot o' auld wives grumbling aboot bad coals, an' then had put on his coat an' gae awa' tae preside at a Skule Brod Meeting, or sit on the bench dealing oot justice without partiality, I'm thinkin' he wid hae been sair enough put aboot, an' I'm no sae sure if he wid ha' dune ony better than I dae. But, minister, Napoleon wis aboot my size, wisna he?"

"He was."

"An' stootness?"

"I think so."

"Then that settles a'," says I.

Sae I got my sword an' cockit hat that I use for ceremonials, an' a pair o' top boots wi' the trooser legs inside like a military man, an' a swallow tail coat, an' awa' we gaed last Tuesday nicht in a cab.

"Noo, Jeems," says Betty, as we were hurlin' alang, "be verra carefu' aboot that sword, it's sure tae be getting fangled in aboot yer legs—carry it below yer oxter."

The cab arrived, an' we were ushered intae the hall amid the plaudits o' the assembled crood.

"Bonyparty an' his lass frae Newhaven," the irreligious ragamuffians cried out.

"Frae Stra'bungo," corrects I, turning roon, for I like tae be polite even tae a crood.

"Hoora', it's Sir Jeems himsel'," they cries. So I took off my hat an' made a bow, an' gathering up my sword, I walked, followed by Betty.

Bailie, sich a scene as wis in the hall I never saw in a' my days afore. There wis —— Oh, I canna tell ye a fiftieth part o' what I saw. Really I never conceived that sae mony illustrious personages had ever leeved in the worl' as wis represented that nicht—baith men an' women. I walked aboot wi' Betty on my arm, the observed o' a' observers, for it wisna often ye could see a French Emperor arm in arm wi' a puir Scotch fisherwoman. Of course we were jist letting on, still it wis wonderfu'.

Noo, Betty when we were coortin' was coonted rale guid at singing "Wha'll buy my caller herring," an' as we were promenading aboot I whispered tae her, "it's getting a wee monotonous, gie us a verse o' yer favorite sang." So Betty, being a vera obedient wife, cried oot—

"Caller ou! caller ou!" twice, an' in a minute she wis the centre o' a curious crood. I gied her a nudge, and she cleared her throat and commenced tae sing—

Wha'l buy my caller herring,
My bonnie caller herring.

An' when she cam' tae the bit aboot "the lives o' men," an' the folks began tae be affected tae tears, I took aff my hat an' walked in amang them an' gathered siller for the sick bairns. Bailie, it wis a gran' plan. Tae see Napoleon Bonyparty going oot an' in amang them wi' his cocked hat in his haund gathering siller, jist like an organ man wi' a monkey, wis what naebody could withstaund. In a wee I had my hat rinnin' ower, so I carried it awa' tae the Treasurer. Then a bricht thocht struck me, an' I got him tae stick up a bill—

Great Attraction For This Night Only,
NAPOLEON BONYPARTY
Will Dance the Heelan' Fling in full French Costume.
To Conclude with the Sword Dance.
Admission—Sixpence.

The wee room wis crooded tae suffocation, an' a guid sum wis gathered for the charity—an', Bailie, altho' I say't that shouldna say't, I quite excelled mysel'. I danced till I wis like tae drap doon. I first took aff my hat, an' then my coat, and then wis unbuttonin' my waistcoat, but the Secretary said it wid never dae for Napaleon tae be without a waistcoat.

After I had got a glass o' cham-pagne, I gaed awa' intae the ball-room again tae enjoy mysel', an' seein' a nice looking young lady without a partner I took aff my hat, an' makin' a bow I says, "Parley voo frongsay." Of course, Bailie, you ken that means "can you speak French;" the fact is I learned it for the occasion frae a Frenchman that stops no faur frae us. But seemingly the young lady didnaken French, for she only stared at me, so I says again tae her, "Parley voo frongsay, mem." She smiled, an' replied, "Wee, Mossoo."

Dod, Bailie, I thocht she needna be sae unpolite as tae cast up my size tae my ain face, but the ladies are getting vera free noo-a-days, so I packeted my pride an' says, "Yon exhausts a' my French, but if ye like we could hae a dance thegither." She said "With Pleasure, Mossoo"—ye ken "Mossoo" means "Mister" ower in France. So we commenced the next dance' an' got on fine, till my sword got lowse someway, an' got in aboot my legs, an'——

I draw a veil, Bailie, ower the rippit that got up. It seems tae me that I canna dae the vera simplest thing without getting intae some habble. I went heids ower heels, knocking my partner doon, as well as ither twa couple that were near us. I needna tell ye that I wis awfu' ashamed, while as for my partner, she took a fit o' hysterics or something, an' had tae be carried intae the refreshment room. Indeed that wis where I went mysel' whenever I wis able tae walk. But a tumble tae a heavy man at my time o' life is nae joke, so I searched oot Betty, an' we got a cab an' gied awa', an' I'm tellin' nae mair than the truth when I say that Bonyparty going hame wis a vera different man frae Bonyparty setting oot.—Yours, etc.,

GLADSTONE AND INGERSOLL.

The Great Statesman Discusses the Famous Infidel's Anti-Christian Screeds.

In the May number of the North American Review W. E. Gladstone defends the Christian faith against Col. Robert G. Ingersoll's attacks. The ex-Premier describes himself as listening from across the broad Atlantic to the clash of arms in the combat between Col. Ingersoll and Dr. Field. He pleads guilty to not having "the personal knowledge which assisted those doughty champions in making reciprocal acknowledgments, as broad as could be desired, with reference to personal character and motive. Such acknowledgments are of high value in keeping the issue clear, if not always, of all adventitious, yet of all venomous, matter.

Destitute of the experience on which to found them as original testimonies," he says, "still, in attempting partially to criticize the remarkable reply of Col. Ingersoll, I can both accept in good faith what has been said by Dr. Field and add that it seems to me consonant with the strain of the pages I have before me. Having said this I shall allow myself the utmost freedom in remarks, which will be addressed exclusively to the matter, not the man.

"I do not remember ever to have read a composition, in which the merely local covering of particular and even very limited sections of Christianity was more systematically used as if it had been available and legitimate argument against the whole than in the reply before us. Col. Ingersoll writes with rare and enviable brilliancy, but also with an impetus which he seems unable to control. Denunciation, sarcasm and invective may be said to constitute the staple of his work, and if argument or some favorable admission here and there peep out for a moment, the writer soon leaves the dry and barren heights for his favorite and more luxurious galloping grounds beneath. * * * The paper, noteworthy as it is, leaves on my mind the impression of a battle-field where every man strikes at every man, and all is noise, hurry and confusion. Better, surely, had it been, and worthier of the great weight and elevation of the subject, if the controversy had been waged after the pattern of those engagements where a chosen champion on either side, in a space carefully limited and reserved, does battle in behalf o feach silent and expectant host. The promiscuous crowds represent all the lower elements which enter into human conflicts. The chosen champions and the order of their proceeding signify the dominion of reason over force, and its place as the sovereign arbiter of the great questions that involve the main destiny of man. * * *

"I do not deny that a person who deems a given religion to be wicked may be led onward by logical consistency to impugn in strong terms the character of the author and object of that religion. But he is surely bound by the laws of social morality and decency to consider well the terms and the manner of his indictment. * * * Are not such methods of proceeding more suited to placards at an election than to disquisitions on these most solemn subjects. * * *

"I venture on remarking that the doctrine on evolution has acquired both praise and dispraise which it does not deserve. It is lauded in the skeptical camp because it is supposed to get rid of the shocking idea of what are termed sudden acts of creation; and it is as unjustly dispraised on the opposite side, because it is thought to bridge over the gap between man and the inferior animals, and give emphasis to the relationship between them. * * *

"As in ordinary conduct, so in considering the basis of belief, we are bound to look at the evidence as a whole. We have no right to demand demonstrative proofs, or the removal of all conflicting elements, either in the one sphere or in the other. What guides us sufficiently in matters of common practice has the very same authority to guide us in matters of speculation; more properly, perhaps, to be called the practice of the soul. * * *

"The reasoning faculty is, therefore, wholly extrinsic to our moral nature, and no influence is or can be received or imparted between them. * * * It is not difficult to see that while the reply aims at uplifting human nature, it in reality plunges us (p. 175) into the abyss of degradation by the destruction of moral freedom, responsibility and unity. For we are justly told that 'reason is the supreme and final test.' * * * Let us try this by a test cas. A father who has believed his son to have been through life upright, suddenly finds that charges are made from various quarters against his integrity. Or a friend, greatly dependent for the work of his life on the co-operation of another friend, is told that that comrade is counterworking and betraying him. I make no assumption now as to the evidence or the result, but I ask which of them could approach the investigation without feeling a desire to be able to acquit? And what shall we say of the desire to condemn? * * * According to the reply it must be a mistake to suppose that there is anywhere in the world such a thing as bias, or prejudice, or prepossession; they are words without meaning in regard to our judgments, for, even if they could raise a clamor from without, the intellect sits within, in an atmosphere of serenity, and, like justice, is deaf and blind as well as calm.

"In addition to all other faults, I hold that this philosophy, or phantasm of philosophy, is eminently retrogressive. * * * With complication, introspection has largely extended, and I believe that, as observation extends its field, so far from isolating the intelligence and making it autocratic, tends more and more to enhance and multiply the infinitely subtle, as well as the broader and more palpable modes, in which the interaction of the human faculties is carried on. Who among us has not had occasion to observe, in the course of his experience, how largely the intellectual power of a man is affected by the demands of life on his moral powers, and how they open and grow, or dry up and dwindle, according to the manner in which those demands are met?"

When the United States Senate is doing business under what is known as the five-minute rule President Ingalls limits the time of the speakers not by his watch, but by an ancient sand-glass, which has been in use by the Senate for many years. As soon as a Senator begins his speech the glass is set, and as soon as the sand has all run out, down comes the President's gavel

HER EXPERIENCE WITH LAWYERS.

A Story Illustrating Woman's Dislike of Litigation.

The peculiarity of women, more than men, is crazes in doing things. Only in one point are they less given to craze than men. They don't like to go to law, as a rule; and just as you often find things in life, when you meet with an exception, it's generally an incomprehensible one. A lawyer friend of mine, rather out of practice—that is, he hadn't yet succeeded in getting in—was seated in his lonely office one day thinking out the problem of how much the dignity of belonging to a learned profession was supposed to be considered as equal to income, when he was startled by a timid knock at the door. It was not one of his boon companions. It was not another briefless lawyer coming in to borrow a dollar. It was a female knock, distinctly the knocking of a tiny, gloved knuckle. It doesn't seem poetic to speak of a lady's "knuckle;" but facts are seldom poetical. It was not a book-agent, that was quite certain; so he invited her in. She came in. She was tearfully chipper.

"Is this a lawyer's office?"

"It is, madam."

"And are you a lawyer?"

He thought at first he would say that only a few people had hitherto believed that, but it might spoil his business. He bowed politely and offered her a chair. She sat down and unfolded the facts of the case. She had been badly treated by her husband. She had had at one time a few thousand dollars, and she met a man who was "broke." He was good-looking. There is nothing so fascinating to a woman with a small bank account as a handsome man who is "broke." She immediately loves him. She loved him so dearly that she gave him her hand, heart and bank account. He squeezed the first, gracefully accepted the second and grabbed the third. He started in business and made a fortune, and they had a good time for a year or two. He took advantage of her absence in the East to switch his affections on to another woman. There are a great many side checks in the sentimental part of life, and sometimes main lines cross one another effectually. Life is full of junctions, and it is when they come to a junction that the married people have to look out for one another. Well, she had got out of the train for a minute, so to speak, and missed it. The case offered great chances. The man was wealthy, and the poor but brilliant lawyer saw a big contingent fee. He accepted the case for that contingent fee and undertook to put up the necessary preliminary expenses. The case moved along. He was out $20, and she was to come down and sign the papers. She came.

"Are the papers ready?"

"Yes. Here they are, madam. If you will put your name there——"

"Well, you can just tear them up."

"Tear them up! Why?"

"I don't want to go on with the case. I love him too well."

"Very well, madam. In that case——"

"I'm very much obliged to you, and I am so sorry you've had all this trouble."

"Yes, madam. My bill will be $50."

"What? You said it wouldn't cost me a cent to begin the suit."

"But you haven't begun the suit, and I am out a good deal for expenses."

"I won't pay it."

"If you don't, it will be $100 to-morrow."

She wouldn't pay. Next day he sent up a sheriff with an attachment, as a threat, at least. She came down, offered him $20, then $30, then she proposed he should take her lace parasol. Finally she paid him $50, gave him a parting shot of polite language and went out. The curious part of the story was that inquiry elicited the fact that she had gone through the same process, except paying, with thirteen different lawyers in the city, all on the same proposition.—San Francisco Chronicle.

The Story of a Lady's Reticule.

Dr. Alfred Gatty sends the following to London Notes and Queries: "I have heard on good authority that there is an interesting relic preserved in Alnwick Castle, to which a romantic legend is attached. The treasured relic is a lady's reticule, such as was commonly carried seventy years ago—more or less—and which did the duty of a pocket. On the night preceding the battle of Waterloo the Duke of Wellington and his chief officers attended a ball at Brussels, given by the Duchess of Richmond; and Major Percy, who was present, became deeply interested in a lady whom he met for the first time. When 'midnight brought the signal-sound of strife,' and Major Percy and the lady had to part, with mutual regret, he begged of her some souvenir of their happy meeting, and she resigned to him her reticule. Next day came the great battle, and Major Percy was selected to convey to Lord Bathurst the Duke's famous despatch, with its admirable description of the contest, dated Waterloo, June 19th, 1815. This precious document was conveyed to the Minister in the treasured reticule. The story as told to me ended with the sad conclusion that the Major searched in vain for the owner of the reticule, and they never afterwards met."

Fashion in Strawberries.

Strawberries are comparatively low, but the bottoms of the boxes are higher than ever. Another year users of the luscious fruit will likely petition the producers to turn the boxes upside down and fill the bottoms.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

The Druggist's Awful Mistake.

Druggist (in alarm, to boy): "James, run to Mrs. Smith's at once. I've made an awful mistake!" James (seizing his hat): "Morphine—quinine—arsenic——?" "No, no; she sent for 10 cents' worth of 1-cent stamps and I sent her ten twos."

DELUSION OF A HEMP EATER.

Wonderful Magnifying of the Imagination Caused by the Drug.

A writer in St. James' Gazette gives the following description of his marvellous sensation while under the influence of Indian hemp. A friend of ours told us of his experience with the potent drug in Washington during the war, when he took a quantity in an experimental way. In his case the hallucinations as to time and distance were very similar to those given below. It is not an experience to be desired. The room seems to turn round; the people near appear to rise to the ceiling; the pulse beats with extreme rapidity, and the throbbing of the heart becomes impossible, for one cannot recollect anything—the ideas seem to slip away. In another 10 minutes the characteristic indications of hemp-eating appear. Every object around attains a monstrous size. Men and women seem of Brobdignagian proportions, the cushions upon which one sits seem fit for giants, and any trifling obstacle in the way when you attempt to walk appears so big that you fear to step over it. The room in which you may be sitting seems to stretch beyond the range of sight, and one fancies the street outside is receding before one's very eye. All sense of time is lost now, and when he is spoken to the hemp-eater fancies there are long and apparently senseless intervals between the words. His own attempt at speech are similarly marked; the syllables come slowly, laboriously, and minutes seem to elapse between the beginning and end of a word. In this stage it is usual to partake of more coffee, which changes the nature of the sensations. A whiff at the narghile that always accompanies the beverage, and the body seems to rise in the air and float about, though inexplicably enough the feet keep firmly pressed to the ground. Then one's legs and arms appear to drop off, and life and sensation concentrate themselves, to one's thinking, in the back of the head, which feels full to bursting. Gradually strength leaves the smoker; the pipe slips from the nerveless fingers; the will altogether fails, and the body seems to rise and float away in space. A heavy, dreamless sleep usually succeeds such an indulgence in the drug, and as a rule the novice awakes none the worse for the evening's experiment. A little lemon juice removes any sensation of nausea or light headache that may ensue.

She Knew Him.

"You know the defendant in this case, do you?" asked a Kansas lawyer of a female native of the soil.

"Know which?" she asked.

"The defendant, Jake Lynch?"

"Do I know Jake Lynch?"

"Yes."

"You want to know if I know Jake Lynch—well, if that ain't a good one. Why, mister, the Lynch family an' "——

"Can't you say 'yes' or 'no'?"

"Why, Jake Lynch's mother an' my step-dad's father was once first cousins, an' "——

"Then you know him?"

"Who, Jake Lynch? Me know Jake Lynch? You're a stranger in these parts, ain't you?"

"That has nothing to do with the case. If you know Jake Lynch say so."

"If I know him! Lemme tell you that Jake Lynch's birthday and my brother Hiram's is on the same day, an' "——

"You know him, of course, then?"

"Who—Jake Lynch? Ask Jake if I know him! Ask him if he was ever interdlooced to Betty Skelton."

"I don't care to ask him anything. I simply want to ask you if Jake Lynch is known to you personally."

"Pussonly? Well, I don't know what you mean by 'pussonly,' but if you want to know if I know Jake an' if he knows me, I can tell you in mighty few words. Jake Lynch's father an' my father "——

"Now, I want you to say 'yes' or 'no.'"

"Thought you wanted me to say if I knew Jake Lynch."

"That's just what I do want."

"Well, then, lemme alone an' I'll tell you all about it. Jake Lynch was born in Injeeany an' I was born in the same county an' "——

"And of course you know him?"

"Who—Jake Lynch? Do I know Jake Lynch, when the very hoss he rid here on was one he traded my man a span of young steers for? Why, man, Jake's wife was Ann Elizy Skiff, an' her an' me is the same age to a day an' "——

"That will do. I see that you do know him."

"Know him? Know Jake? Why man "——

"That will do."

"Why, I was married on Chewsday an' Jake was married the next day, an' his oldest boy an' my oldest girl is most the same age, an' "——

"That will do."—Chicago Tribune.

A Bad Look Out.

The following is a fair specimen of what the country correspondent sends to the papers just now: No growth is the general cry among the farmers throughout this district. Wheat which looked fairly well a few weeks since is going back. Cold winds and heavy frosts have retarded the growth and the prospect of the wheat and hay is very poor. Should the present weather continue much longer, gloomy prospects seem to be facing the best agriculturist.

Crippled by a Kiss.

A little boy, a cripple, was being wheeled past a Centre avenue store yesterday, when a gentleman who noticed the unfortunate child said: "That little boy's misfortune is the result of a kiss. When he was a baby his sister, on coming into the house, went up behind the high chair in which he was seated, and, catching his head suddenly, gave it a turn and kissed him. The shock injured his spine and he is going through the world a cripple for life.—Bay City Tribune.

Colonel Nicholas Smith, the Kentucky professional beauty who married one of Horace Greeley's daughters, is an extremely modest man. Recently while in New York a lady sarcastically said to him: "Oh, Colonel Smith, how much you look like George Washington!" And the elegant colonel gravely responded: "Madame, Washington was a good and great man and deserves the compliment."

THE BADGEROS OUTRAGE.

We do not agree with the Dundalk Herald, that it would be "a gross breach of faith" on its part to expose the real name of "Hard-to-Roll." Nor are we of opinion that such a course would leave our esteemed contemporary open to the charge of having turned traitor "on one who had placed confidence in his fidelity." Let it not be forgotten, however, that our remarks in this connection apply to "Hard-to-Roll" and to him alone. This latter personage has found his way into public print under a deeper shadow than the masked marauders, who evicted the unfortunate Badgeros widow under cover of darkness. He makes use of the privilege accorded him in the columns of the Herald to defend the lawless terrorists and threaten respectable people with a similar "fate" if they don't close their eyes or wink at the rascally deed. What the scoundrels did once they will repeat when opportunity offers; and it is our belief that this "Hard-to-Roll" is pretty well acquainted with the persons who figured in that disgraceful episode. Under these circumstances, we feel convinced that he should be unmasked and the law set in motion against the whole gang.

Let us ask the Herald one question: Suppose this "Hard-to-Roll" chap and his gang carry out the threat twice made in public print by the former—viz., to repeat the Badgeros bullies midnight ruffianism act on any person giving offence to their high mightinesses—would the Herald still consider it a "gross breach of faith" to unmask the defender of "lawless terrorism?"

In our opinion, had "Hard-to-Roll" confined himself to a simple narration of facts, and apologized for the outrage—however illogically there would have been some excuse for shielding him. But, availing himself promptly of the privilege all too generously accorded him by the Editor, he boldly defended the lawless actors in that midnight drama, and threatened a repetition thereof! A man who could have the brazen effrontery to rush into print after that fashion, requires to be watched as closely as a human firebug, dynamiter or chicken thief!

CANADA'S NEW PARTY.

Two circulars were received at this office the other day from the headquarters of "Canada's New Party," Toronto. One was entitled, "An Address to the People," and contained the signatures of Rev. Dr. Sutherland and Mr. W. Munns, President and Secretary respectively. The other was entitled, "President's Address at the Inaugural Meeting, March 21st, 1888." From the first, we learn that the following nine "planks" constitute the platform of the New Party:—

1.—Righteousness and truth in public affairs as well as in private business, and no compromise with wrong.

2.—Equal rights for all creeds, classes and nationalities, but exclusive privileges to none.

3.—A national sentiment, a national literature, and in all matters of public policy—our country first.

4. The prompt and absolute prohibition of the liquor traffic, and the honest and vigorous enforcement of all laws for the repression of vice and intemperance.

5.—Retrenchment and economy in public expenditure, with the view of reducing our enormous national debt.

6.—Manhood suffrage, with an educational qualification; that is, a vote to every freeman of legal age who can read and write.

7.—The extension of the franchise to women.

8.—An elective senate.

9.—Civil service reform.

These are strong planks, and if it can be shown that they do not exist in the platforms of either of the great political parties, "Canada's New Party" will soon gain for itself plenty of adherents.

In our next issue we will endeavor to find space for at least one of the circulars referred to above.

THE VALLEY ROAD.

Now that this important addition to the facilities provided for the travelling public has been made, it is absolutely necessary that commissioners and pathmasters see to it that it is kept in repair and carefully improved from time to time. Present indications suggest culpable neglect, and as a servant of the people, THE ADVANCE has been constrained to direct the attention of the proper authorities thereto.

Various rumors have reached us in connection with the road, but as an ADVANCE representative will shortly make a "tour of inspection" thereon, we prefer to speak from personal experience.

Some Noted Irishmen.

SONS OF THE EMERALD ISLE WHOSE NAMES STAND HIGH ON THE ROLL OF FAME.

From the Kansas City Star.

Since Prof. Goldwin Smith, the avowed enemy of the Irish, has at the hundred and second anniversary of the St. George Society, New York, considered it good taste to put forth his bigotry, and the splendid speaker, Chauncey Depew, meantime abandoned the toast, "The Genius of Shakespeare," to express his entire disapproval and opposition to the Professor's sentiments, it may not be amiss to say something of the nationality to which I belong. "Uninventive and imaginative" is the phrase usually applied to the Irish. Well, they have imagination, I suppose, because it is a glorious thing, but can anyone read the works of Edmund Burke, Richard Sheridan, Daniel O'Connell, Dean Swift, Thomas Moore, Oliver Goldsmith, and others, all Irishmen, without seeing something real as well as imaginary? As to "uninventive"—it was an Irishman's son, Robert Fulton, that gave to America the credit of inventing steam navigation; it was an Irishman's grandson, Samuel Morse, that invented telegraphy; it was the descendant of an Irishman, McCormick, that invented the reaping and mowing machines; and another descendant of an Irishman, Horace Greeley, with no meagre inventive talent, that founded The Tribune. Numerous names worthy of mention are connected with science: Crawford the sculptor, Vincent Wallace, the composer; John Roach, the shipbuilder.

The highest but one in rank in our army is Irish, and the second in command in our navy, Rowan, is a native of Ireland, as is the first in command, Porter, the descendant of an Irishman. The greatest British painter was Irish; the greatest British dentist, Joseph Black, was Irish; the greatest British philosopher, Robert Boyle, was Irish; the greatest British statesman, Edmund Burke, was Irish; the greatest British satirist, Sir Philip Francis, was Irish; the greatest British naturalist, Hans Sloane, was Irish. John Tyndall is not a British scientist, but an Irish Scientist in Britain. Spranger Barry is an Irish tragedian entertaining British with Irish plays. It was an Irishman, John Knox, that first read the Declaration of Independence. John Dunlap, an Irishman, first published that declaration, and the same John Dunlap first printed and published the first daily paper in the United States. An Irishman wrote the first history of the United States; John Sulivan "fired the first shot at the King's power;" John Bay, an Irishman, was the first commander of the American Navy. An Irishman, General Richard Montgomery, fell while commanding an American army and fighting for American independance. Henry Knox, an Irishman, fought in every battle with Washington, and was the first Secretary of War.

The Demosthenes of the Revolution, Patrick Henry, was Irish. Then may glory be around the graves of the Knoxes, Clintons, Butlers, Irvings. Hands, Starks Moylands, Thompsons, Sullivans, Montgomerys and Waynes, whose Irish swords flashed brightest in the contest that won American independence; and bright be the light that clusters around the solitary ray of English patriotism that glistened on the blade of Yates, McClelland, McPherson, Cook, famous Phil Kearney, Lee, Jackson, Scott, Glebourne, McDowell, Rowan, Porter, Shields and Logan are all Celts, and why not pay a passing tribute to our own Irish hero of Winchester—Phil Sheridan? We, the people of the United States, are said to be Anglo-Saxon. We are not, but are in a truer sense of Celtic extraction. The great branch of the Anglo-Saxon amounts to no more than 5,000,000. The Celt element is 30,000,000. Of the thirty-nine States and eleven Territories more than thirty were settled by France and Spain. Nor were the original thirteen states settled by Saxons. These are historical facts and yet Prof. Goldwin Smith quarrels with Home Rule and the conduct of the members of the House of Commons. To be brief, these same members are admitted to be the brightest set of legislators in the world, but Mr. Smith says that, although they legislate for England, they are unequal to the task of legislating for Ireland.

NEAL DOW ON HIGH LICENSE.

St. Paul, Minn., April 28.—On April 14, there was printed a dispatch from Portland, Me., saying that Maine would probably have a high license law in three years and that the prohibition law, against which public sentiment was growing, was openly disregarded throughout the State. D. C. Stearns of Zumbrota, Minn., wrote to Neal Dow enclosing the telegram and received the following reply:

There is nothing whatever in Maine to justify the statement in this slip. There is no sentiment whatever in Maine in favor of high license or any form of that policy. Prohibition in Maine is finally and immovably fixed in the public opinion of the State, as it is in the Constitution, where it was put in 1884, by a vote of three to one. Statements of fancy kinds similar in character to those in this slip are constantly going the rounds of the press, having their origin in the literary fund of the liquor league, by which their writers are supposed to be pensioned and newspapers subsidized. Respectfully.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.
DISEASES OF MAN.
M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,
THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,
Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.
Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN
Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.
SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.
Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

Owen Sound.

From our own Correspondent.

A grand base ball match will be played here on the 24th of May, between the Toronto and Owen Sound clubs.

The boats are now beginning to run. The first excursion of the season to be on 24th of May, so report says.

Dr. John Barnhart, who left O. S. last summer to reside in Hamilton, has returned, and will build a residence in Brookholm, a few miles from this town.

Mr. Harry Tucker leaves shortly for a tour to the old country. Mr. Tucker's law affairs in his absence will be attended to by Mr. Chas. Notter. We wish our young friend a safe voyage.

Mr. M. Richardson, of Flesherton, was in town last Saturday, Sunday, and Monday. He was warmly welcomed, it being some years since he was here before. He addressed the Methodist Sabbath School on Sunday afternoon and delivered his remarks in an impressive and pleasing manner. Mr. Richardson undoubtedly possesses fine intellectual abilities, and should he at any future date visit our town again, we bespeak him a warm welcome. We are glad to learn from him that Flesherton is improving; we had that idea anyway. Why shouldn't it go ahead with such enterprising people, and such an "Advance"-ing paper!

A company has struck natural gas at Collingwood. The O. S. Advertiser expresses congratulations and says its refreshing to hear of that decaying town striking something else besides hard luck!!!

Eugenia.

From our own Correspondent.

ANOTHER OLD RESIDENT GONE.

On Wednesday morning, 16th inst., Mrs. Wilson, of Eugenia, passed quietly away to her long home. The deceased lady was a native of Belfast, Ireland, and came to America in the year 1879. She was one of the oldest residents in Artemesia, having attained the ripe age of 93 years. The remains were interred in Salem cemetery on Friday and were followed to their last resting place by a large concourse of friends and neighbors. The obsequies were conducted by the Rev. Thos. Watson, Baptist minister, Flesherton. The subject of discourse was Ps. xviii, 15, "I shall be satisfied when I awake with Thy likeness." A very earnest and eloquent address was given.

One of our townsmen, Mr. Wm. Suggitt, started for England, the land of his nativity, on Tuesday morning. We wish him a prosperous journey, a happy time, and hope to see him back in due time looking hale and hearty.

Messrs. Joseph and Robert Williams have gone to spend the summer up the lakes. The migratory fever has broken out in Eugenia, and unless some business is started soon to furnish employment, it is feared the town will be depopulated.

The fishing season has fairly begun and "the small boy" hailed its advent with almost as much delight as he did the sugar-making season, and may be seen every evening with tackle in hand trying to take the finny game. KATE.

The Emeralds.

In addition to generous reports of our work, the Methodist, of Montreal, says editorially: "These gospel temperance revivalists have had a wonderful success in our city during the past few weeks. Montreal audiences are apt to be very critical, especially on musical matters, and rather chary in taking up anything new, and we can conceive of no better criterian to judge the Emeralds by than the fact that the largest churches have been crowded nightly to hear them. Over 12,000 have taken the pledge of total abstinence, and hundreds have made application for membership in the different Councils of the Royal Templars of Temperance, METROPOLIS Council receiving forty-two, ST. LAWRENCE one hundred and twenty-five, and RELIANCE one hundred and thirty-two; besides which, ORIENT Council was instituted by Bro. Smith, leader of the band, in the east end of the city, on Wednesday the 25th ult., with one hundred and thirty-two charter members and thirty-six other applicants. The Royal Templars seem to have struck the right line of action in introducing the Gospel plan into their work, and have undoubtedly been very happy in their choice of men. The Emeralds have a power not their own, and thus are able to win their way to the hearts of their audiences from the very first, and to retain them to the last. They are as much at home, pleading with a soul for its conversion, in visiting the sick, and counselling the erring, as in presenting the claims of temperance. Their motto is—"Total abstinence for all and prohibition for the state." Or, as Bro. Smith very aptly puts it—

If I had a fold where the wolf crept in,
And ate up my sheep and lambs like sin,
I'd hold him in tight partition,
For I'd choke out the howl of his tainted breath,
And save my flock by his instant death,
And THAT is prohibition.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

You Carry

A whole medicine chest in your pocket, with one box of Ayer's Pills. As they operate directly on the stomach and bowels, they indirectly affect every other organ of the body. When the stomach is out of order, the head is affected, digestion fails, the blood becomes impoverished, and you fail an easy victim to any prevalent disease. Miss M. E. Boyle, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., puts the whole truth in a nutshell, when she says: "I use no other medicine than Ayer's Pills. They are all that any one needs, and just splendid to save money in doctors' bills."

Here is an instance of

who lost his medicine chest, but, having at hand a bottle of Ayer's Pills, found himself fully equipped.—J. Arrison, M. D., of San José, Cal., writes:

"Some three years ago, by the merest accident, I was forced, so to speak, to prescribe Ayer's Cathartic Pills for several sick men among a party of engineers in the Sierra Nevada mountains, my medicine chest having been lost in crossing a mountain torrent. I was surprised and delighted at the action of the Pills, so much so, indeed, that I was led to a further trial of them, as well as of your Cherry Pectoral and Sarsaparilla. I have nothing but praise to offer in their favor."

John W. Brown, M. D., of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I prescribe Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."

T. E. Hastings, M. D., of Baltimore, Md., writes: "That Ayer's Pills do control and cure the complaints for which they are designed, is as conclusively proven to me as anything possibly can be. They are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of the profession."

PARNELL'S EIGHTY CLUB SPEECH.

The Irish Leader Didn't Approve of the Plan of Campaign—His Interview with Carnarvon—The Irish and the Pope.

A London cable says: The Eighty Club gave a banquet to Mr. Parnell on Tuesday evening. Mr. Herbert Gladstone, the Earl of Cavan and all the leading Parnellites were present. Mr. Parnell, on rising to speak, was received with prolonged cheers. He thanked the club for the honor done him, and said that the occasion would have a great effect in Ireland, reminding Irishmen that they were not alone in the struggle, and what was more important, that their responsibility was not the sole responsibility in this matter. With reference to Lord Carnarvon, he said: "His Lordship has sought refuge in evasion, but he has never denied any statement that I have made. I should not have referred to Lord Carnarvon in his absence had not Lord Salisbury attacked us in our connection with the Liberals as assassins, unfit to be entrusted with the government of Ireland. That, I think, entitled me to retort. The Conservatives have not always considered it derogatory to invite us to interviews and dinners and luncheons in order to consult us in regard to the manner in which Ireland should be governed. Lord Carnarvon had ample opportunity to deny the statements made by me three months ago by letter, but, instead of doing so, he waited until my friend, Dwyer Gray, to whom he made the communication, was dead before he attempted to contradict me." In further confirmation of Mr. Gray's statement Mr. Parnell then read the letter from Mr. Gray to Lord Carnarvon which was written a year after the interview, when Lord Carnarvon was no longer in office. In this letter Mr. Gray reminds Lord Carnarvon of the latter's decision that the Crossmaglen prisoners ought to be liberated, and asked him to impart that decision to the present Lord-Lieutenant. Lord Carnarvon replied, accusing Mr. Gray of a breach of confidence. Mr. Parnell then told of an interview between himself and Lord Carnarvon at the latter's invitation, at which Carnarvon agreed that it would be advisable to give Ireland a Parliament and to protect her industries, and Mr. Parnell admitted that in such an event the League should become useless and would be dissolved. "Lord Carnarvon," continued Mr. Parnell, "never denied these statements, and I never said he pledged himself to them. He admits, however, that Lord Salisbury knew beforehand that the interview was coming, and he was afterward informed of its tenor. He accuses me of a breach of confidence in having invited him to publish the text of his written communication to Lord Salisbury immediately after the interview." Mr. Parnell then proceeded to speak of the Popo's rescript. He said he approached the subject with unwillingness, and did not think it his business as a Protestant to vindicate the freedom of Catholics. He was convinced that Irish Catholics knew their political duty and how to vindicate themselves. They would not allow anybody, however high and influential, to influence them a jot in their political duty to their country, a thing that had been repeatedly tried from Rome, but had always failed. With regard to the Plan of Campaign, when that was instituted he was dangerously ill and compelled to refrain from all work. He confessed, however, that although the plan had benefited thousands and pacified the country, he would then have advised against it because it contained features inimical to the national situation, and would serve as a pretext for the Tories to inflict further coercion. When, in 1887, he was able to speak, it was too late. The Government had already struck at Dillon and O'Brien, and he thought it better to let the matter rest, but he stipulated that neither the League nor the Parnellite party should be identified with the plan, and that the sphere of the plan should be as restricted as possible. "While leaving to Dillon, O'Brien and others to deal with the rescript," he said, "I shall adhere to our custom when the Government strikes an Irishman to fight for him whether he be right or wrong." He concluded with a long defence of political combination, and drew a comparison between law in England and law in Ireland. He predicted coming trouble in Ireland over evictions, which he believed the Government feared as much as did the tenants. He counseled his countrymen to keep strictly within the law as understood in England. In response to many calls, Mr. John Morley spoke briefly, concluding by proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Parnell.

A Thunder Storm Panic.

A last (Thursday) night's Kingston despatch says: About 11.30 o'clock last night a violent rain storm, accompanied by heavy thunder and lightning, visited this section. People were suddenly startled by a flash of lightning, quickly followed by a clap of thunder which made the houses shake. Some received such a shock that they were unable to sleep for the rest of the night. Mr. Campbell, manager of the Electric Light Company, gave an account of the storm as affecting the lighting station. The wires were heavily charged, and the electricity could be seen playing freely on them. It ran along them to the station when the thunder was loudest. The room immediately filled with electricity and the dynamos began to blaze. The employees became frightened, stopped the engine, and ran out of the building. One called for the chemical engine, but when she arrived it was found that she was not needed. The only damage found was that one of the wires in the magnet of one of the dynamos had been burned. Several telephones were destroyed. Four men in one hotel rushed to the office frightened, and for a time refused to be comforted.

Easily Pleased.

She (just through playing)—"I fear, Mr. Sniggles, my music is too poor to give you enjoyment."

He (assuringly)—"Oh, indeed! I do enjoy it. It does not take much to please me in the line of music, you know."—Judge.

STRADDLING THE BOUNDARY.

How a Sharp Yankee Bade Defiance to Canadian Constables.

A Montreal special says: Deputy High Constables Bissonette and Champagne have just arrived from United States territory, but not at all favorably impressed with the manner in which they were treated by the American authorities. Some time ago it was related in the Empire that John Tolmie, of Fort Covington, whose store was situated exactly on the boundary line, had purchased $1,000 worth of goods in Montreal, and, not wishing to pay for the same, had evaded all attempts at seizure by quietly moving the goods from the Canadian to the American side of the establishment. A few weeks since Tolmie, being in Montreal as a witness in a civil case, was arrested, but having previously claimed the protection of the court, Judge Doherty ordered his release and sent him back home under a police escort. The other day Mr. Bruneau, bailiff, who had been charged to make the seizure of the goods five years ago, obtained a new warrant against Tolmie and Messrs. Bissonette and Champagne left town on Friday evening to execute the same. The wide-awake, but not strictly honest, trader has his residence on Canadian soil, but his place of business is crossed diagonally by the boundary line. It appears that he has a good many men in his employ, so that the proprietor has very little work to do, and for the last month or two Tolmie, while in his shop, remained seated on the line which divides Canada from the United States. When coming into Canada to take his meals he is escorted by armed men, while other faithful watchers keep a sharp look-out for any one who might approach the house. The entry of the store is from American territory, but Constable Champagne on Saturday managed to get in by the back way, and seeing Tolmie seated on a bench an inch or two over the Canadian line was about to advance to execute the warrant in the officer's possession, when one of six armed men present on the other side of the frontier jumped up and cried out, "If you arrest him I will shoot!" It was thus made evident that Tolmie's arrest is impossible under present circumstances, and the two Canadians returned to Montreal. They state that one of Tolmie's armed guards asserted that he was an American deputy sheriff and was determined that the liberty of an American citizen should not be menaced.

DROWNED OUT OF WATER.

Singular Cause of Death, the Only One of its Kind on Record.

A Cincinnati despatch says: One of the strangest cases of accidental death ever known, and said to be the only one of its kind on record, occurred here on Tuesday. The victim was Willie Ruehrwein, aged 2½ years. The little toddler went to a hydrant in the yard, and, standing upon his toes, managed to close his lips over the end of the nozzle of the hydrant. Then he turned on the water to its fullest force. The child's lips seemed glued to the nozzle with such cohesiveness that his little body hung suspended from it. Meanwhile the stream of water forced itself into his stomach and lungs, causing suffocation. His dreadful predicament was witnessed by his mother, who, when she attempted to lift him, found to her horror that she could not. Horror stricken, she fairly wrenched her babe from the spout, the violent separation tearing the skin inside the mouth. A stream of blood and water flowed from between his lips as she lifted him in her arms. A physician was summoned and found the child beyond aid. The little fellow died within five minutes, having literally drowned out of water. The theory advanced that obtains the most credence is that the sudden rush of water paralyzed the muscles of the throat so that the child could not open its mouth.

Chickens Hatched in a Tree-Top.

A Cadiz (O.) despatch says: Mrs. Samuel Jones, of this country, discovered a hen a week or two ago sitting on top of an old snag in her door-yard. She supposed at the time that the hen was sunning herself, and dismissed the subject from her mind. Yesterday she heard a cackling in her yard, and, on going to the door, saw the hen on the ground with two young chicks. A "chirp, chirp," from the tree indicated there were more to follow. A young chick peeped over the edge of the nest, and, after some time spent in prospecting and conjecturing on the consequences of a fall, tumbled out and down to the ground. Much to the consternation of Mrs. Jones, the little leaper rolled over once or twice, arose to its feet and ran unhurt to its mother. This performance was repeated from the nest in the tree until a dozen young chickens were successfully landed on the ground. The top of the snag is twenty feet from the ground, and free from branches. When the old hen had counted her brood, and found all present, she clucked a satisfied cluck, and strutted around in a way that was proud.

Beauties of Mormonism.

A Nebraska City despatch says: In 1859 John B. Craddock and Miss Mary A. Wilkes were married in Brownell, Staffordshire, England. In 1864 they became converted to the Mormon faith, came to America and made their way to Salt Lake City, the wife going ahead with a waggon train of emigrant women. When Craddock arrived at Salt Lake he could find no trace of his wife, who, it seems, was kept in captivity several months by a Mormon elder. She finally escaped, and failing to find her husband returned to England in 1866. Craddock meanwhile was informed that his wife was dead and he again married, removing to this city. His first wife eight months ago learned of his whereabouts from letters written by Craddock to relatives in England. She came to this city recently and after talking the matter over relinquished all claim to Craddock and left yesterday for home.

His Best Friend.

"I see," remarked the Duke of Toronto, looking over a New Jersey paper, "that Overdraft, the banker, is dead. He was your friend, was he not?" added the Duke kindly, seeing the tears gather in the American's eyes.

"Yes," said the exile, "he was. All that I have in this world I owe to that man. I was his cashier."

"Let's go and liquidate," said the Duke, breaking the long silence.—Brooklyn Eagle.

RUSSIA'S "FAIR CITY."

George Kennan Gives a Description of Nizhni Novgorod.

A City Utterly Deserted at one Season of the Year and Swarming With Busy Multitudes at Another Time—Curious Contrasts.

To a traveller visiting Nizhni Novgorod for the first time there is something surprising, and almost startling, in the appearance of what he supposed to be the city, and in the scene presented to him as he emerges from the railway station and walks away from the low bank of the Oka River in the direction of the Volga. The clean, well paved streets; the long rows of substantial buildings, the spacious boulevard, shaded by leafy birches and poplars; the canal, spanned at intervals by graceful bridges; the picturesque tower of the waterworks; the enormous cathedral of Alexander Nevski; the bourse; the theatres; the hotels; the market places—all seem to indicate a great populous centre of life and commercial activity; but of living inhabitants there is not a sign. Grass and weeds are growing in the middle of the empty streets and in the chinks of the travel-worn sidewalks; birds are singing fearlessly in the trees that shade the lonely and defaced boulevard; the countless shops and warehouses are all closed, barred and padlocked; the bells are silent in the gilded belfries of the churches, and the astonished stranger may perhaps wander for a mile between solid blocks of buildings without seeing an open door, a vehicle or a single human being. The city seems to have been stricken by a pestilence and deserted. If the newcomer remembers for what Nizhni Novgorod is celebrated, he is not long, of course, in coming to the conclusion that he is on the site of the famous fair; but the first realization of the fact that the fair is in itself a separate and independent city, and a city which during nine months of every year stands empty and deserted, comes to him with the shock of a great surprise. The fair city of Nizhni Novgorod is situated on a low peninsula between the Rivers Oka and Volga, just above their junction, very much as New York city is situated on Manhattan Island, between East River and the Hudson. In geographical position it bears the same relation to the old town of Nizhni Novgorod that New York would bear to Jersey City if the latter were elevated on a steep terraced bluff 400 feet above the level of the Hudson

AN EPHEMERAL LIFE.

The Russian fair city, however, differs from New York city in that it is a mere temporary market—a huge commercial caravansary where 500,000 traders assemble every year to buy and sell commodities. In September it has frequently a population of more than 100,000 souls, and contains merchandize valued at $75,000,000, while in January, February or March all of its inhabitants might be fed and sheltered in the smallest of its hotels, and all of its goods might be put into a single one of its innumerable shops. Its life, therefore, is a sort of intermittent commercial fever, in which an annual paroxysm of intense and unnatural activity is followed by a long interval of torpor and stagnation. It seems almost incredible at first that a city of such magnitude—a city which contains churches, mosques, theatres, markets, banks, hotels, a merchants' exchange and nearly 7,000 shops and habitable buildings, should have so ephemeral a life, and should be so completely abandoned every year after it has served the purpose for which it was created. When I saw this unique city for the first time, on a clear frosty night in January, 1868, it presented an extraordinary picture of loneliness and desolation. The moonlight streamed down into its long empty streets where the unbroken snow lay two feet deep upon the sidewalks; it touched with silver the white walls and swelling domes of the old fair cathedral, from whose towers there came no clangor of bells; it sparkled on great snowdrifts heaped up against the doors of the empty houses, and poured a flood of pale light over thousands of snow-covered roofs; but it did not reveal anywhere a sign of a human being. The city seemed to be not only uninhabited, but wholly abandoned to the arctic spirits of solitude and frost.

A BUSY MULTITUDE.

When I saw it next, at the height of the annual fair in the autumn of 1870, it was so changed as to be almost unrecognizable. It was then surrounded by a great forest of shipping; its hot, dusty atmosphere thrilled with the incessant whistling of steamers; merchandise to the value of 125,000,000 rubles lay on its shores or was packed into its 7,000 shops; every building within its limits was crowded; 60,000 people were crossing every day the pontoon bridge which connected it with the old town; a military band was playing airs from Offenbach's operas on the great boulevard in front of the governor's house, and through all the streets of the reanimated and reawakened city poured a great tumultuous flood of human life. I did not see the fair city again until June, 1885, when I found it almost as completely deserted as on the occasion of my first visit, but in other ways greatly changed and improved. Substantial brick buildings had taken the place of the long rows of inflammable wooden shops and sheds; the streets in many parts of the city had been neatly paved; the number of stores and warehouses had largely increased, and the lower end of the peninsula had been improved and dignified by the erection of the great Alexander Nevski cathedral.—George Kennan in the Century.

An Indefinite Postponement.

It was a beautiful moonlight night as they left the theatre, and he had resolved to put the important question without further delay, when she said:

"I think we had better take a street car, Mr. Simpson, rather than walk. We will get home so much quicker."

Then they took a street car, and he postponed the important question.—Harper's Bazar.

The old "Red Horse Inn" at Sudbury, Mass., made famous by Longfellow's "Tales of a Wayside Inn," was sold at auction Tuesday afternoon. It dates back to 1686, and was in possession of the Howe family for generations.

DRIVEN TO THE GRAVE.

How a Penurious Employer Drove a Sweet Scotch Girl to the Grave.

The "Pilgrim's Progress" reporter of the Telegram heard a pathetic story last evening. It's true every word of it, and was told by the pastor of a Fifth avenue church.

He said: "I conducted the funeral of a young girl who died of consumption the other day. It was one of the saddest funerals I ever held.

"Katie was a working girl, a member of my church, industrious and good. She and two other young girls had a room on Washington square, and went out regularly every morning to work.

"The brute for whom Katie worked refused to heat his building last December.

"Katie caught a terrible cold, which developed into consumption. She was forced to go to a hospital and was afterward taken to her aunt's, where she died after weeks of great suffering.

"The parents are now dead and the remaining children are widly scattered, some in the west. The only one at the funeral was a younger sister. She was inconsolable for the loss of her little mother.

"The presence at the funeral of two Chinamen touched me very deeply," the clergymen continued. "They were Katie's scholars at the Spring Street Sabbath School. As the Chinamen passed by the coffin and looked at her for the last time their eyes filled with tears.

"Now, I had not thought of that girl as doing anything special for the Master, and I felt rebuked. Doubtless she felt too much exhausted with the week's work to attend our own Sabbath School in the morning, but she had faithfully given her Sunday afternoon to teaching in the Chinese school.

"It's not easy work teaching the Chinese, although they are intensely grateful, and will do anything for a teacher who gains their confidence. One in a class is the usual number, and a teacher who can interest two is doing remarkably well.

"It impressed me as a forcible suggestion of the promised Christian unity among all nations and peoples the presence of those two Orientals as mourners at the funeral of that poor Scotch girl."—N. Y. Evening Telegram.

Farm and Garden Jottings.

Keep the ground around the roses well stirred and loose, and also keep a careful watch for the rose bugs.

June will be early enough to plant all kinds of beans. Nothing will be gained by getting the seed in before the weather shall have become warm.

Where the tops of young trees have been destroyed cut off the whole of the tops, if dead, and allow sprouts to grow out again from the main stem.

Salt should be placed where all kinds of stock can get it. At this season when green food is becoming plentiful, salt will be found excellent, as it will often prevent bowel diseases and stave off injury from the young grass.

Dr. Dunhoff states that in new comb the thickness of the sides of the cells is but the 180th of an inch. Such delicate work is hardly conceivable, and yet bees often make it in the dark on cool, cloudy days, or in the night, appearing never to rest.

The gooseberry is often sent to market green, and many cases of sickness occur from its use. It is soft when ripe, and the color is a brownish, or purple red. Cooking the green berries improves their quality, but if uncooked they should never be used unless ripe.

Plum trees will thrive well in a poultry-yard and be less subject to the attacks of the curculio. The trees will require the usual jarring, however, but the insects will be destroyed by the poultry, thereby lessening the liability of damage the succeeding year. All plum trees should be in poultry-yards.

The future pig must have more flesh and less fat. It must not be a mere lard keg. It must be fed upon flesh forming foods until grown and then fattened. It means that more clover, peas, oats, milk and such articles of diet must be used, and less corn. We will then have healthier and more palatable pork, and hog cholera will be come a thing of the past.

Warned of His Death in a Dream.

A. F. McNeal, a well-known citizen of Rawson, died yesterday after a short illness, and now comes a weird story connected with this fact, which is as fully authenticated as his death. On the night of the 28th of January of this year he, like Joseph, "dreamed a dream" that he died and went to heaven. In his dream the date of his death, April 26th, was firmly fixed upon his mind. In "the beautiful city, whose maker and builder is God," he dreamed that he met Mr. Manlon Povenmire, of Ada, an old acquaintance and friend, and asked him when he had died and left the earth. Povenmire replied that he had died and come to the eternal world a week before. There were other striking circumstances in the dream equally as strange, and the next morning when McNeal awoke he reduced the details to writing. He was then in excellent health. His wife found the manuscript a few days after it was written, and it worried the wife a good deal, but she said nothing to her husband concerning it. Yesterday, April 26th, McNeal died, while Povenmire joined the silent majority one week ago yesterday. The case is a remarkable one, but it cannot be laughed down, for every word of it is true, and the substance of McNeal's dream is in manuscript, just as he wrote it three months ago.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Medicated Soaps.

According to Professor Shoemaker, soda soaps are more irritating than potash soaps. Soaps that contain free alkali are, in young children, the cause of many skin eruptions. Alum soap is good for chafing. Boro glycerine soap is useful in acne and rough skin. Chamomile soap is mildly stimulating, and is the best soap for dandruff. Naphthal soap is the best application for parasites on any part of the body. Salicylic acid soap is a non-irritating antiseptic soap, and is good for toilet purposes. Corrosive sublimate soap is serviceable for removing freckles, rough skin, for changing a muddy to a clear complexion, and in all kinds of itching.

Rain at a funeral is an excellent sign; it cools the passage into the unknown world.

PLAYGOING IN JAPAN.

Odd Experiences of a European Visitor—Tickets Three Feet Long—Plays that Last for Weeks—No Admission Till You Take Off Your Boots and Have Them Checked Away.

"The theatres and the dramatic literature of Japan are far in advance of those of China," said Joseph Arthur, manager of the "Still Alarm," who spent over a year in the island empire, to a New York Tribune reporter. "The first surprise that awaits the foreign visitor to a Japanese theatre is the ticket he receives in exchange for the money he hands in at the box office. This is a stick of wood about three feet long, and incised with some native characters. The man who receives this adds it to a pile in the corner of the auditorium, and the audience, if they wanted to, could 'count the house' almost as readily as the manager does. Another surprise is the demand for the visitor's shoes. No one is allowed in the theatre with his shoes on, but all move about in their stocking feet. The floor is of beautifully polished wood, or covered with a fine grass matting, and I must say the leaving of the shoes is a plan that works well, though I don't suppose it would be easy to get our people to adopt it. Those who are already in their seats are not disturbed by the footstep of late comers, and there is no rustling of programmes, as they are printed on soft rice paper. A check is given for your shoes, and you can use that as a check to pass in or out, but if you once regain your footwear, there is no re-admission without repayment. However, as the streets of the principal cities are marvellously clean, the natives often go into the streets in search of refreshment, and I and friends with me have followed their example. Prices of admission range from 1 to 50 cents. The theatre is generally provided with one balcony. In the older houses access to this was gained by means of a ladder, but in the more modern structures there are staircases. The balcony is the 'swell' part, and here one is allowed to smoke. A very singular custom prevails of allowing a visitor who pays a small extra fee to stand up, and the unfortunate individual behind him has no right to remonstrate or to rise and try to get a peep at the stage. He may hear, but he cannot see. This is far worse, you perceive, than the ladies' high hat nuisance which is so vigorously protested against here. Another peculiarity is that the extravagantly disposed visitor may purchase the right to sit upon the stage whenever he likes, and the actors go on with their parts in apparent unconsciousness of his presence. I have seen a broadsword combat fought all around a visitor, and he never showed any disposition to budge. It is singular how this privilege of sitting upon the stage has marked the early history of theatres in nearly every country.

"The stage is not as much raised above the floor of the auditorium as is usual with us, the elevation being probably two feet. Their stages are often 70 or 80 feet wide, but not usually of any great depth, a fact due to the same lack of sense of perspective in their stage settings as is conspicuous in their paintings. All changes of scene are made in full view of the audience, no curtain being used, and the work of the carpenter and property-man being considered as much a part of the entertainment as the efforts of the actors. I have seen a couple of lovers come out of a house and take their seats upon the stage, and remain there while the carpenters pulled down the house and built a garden scene around them. When it is desired to convey the idea that the moon is rising, the property man carries a lighted moon across the stage, and, on reaching the further side, stops and blows out the light. All these things seem very absurd to the foreign visitor, but, doubtless, we have conventionalities and traditions in our theatres that would be almost as surprising to the Japanese. Still, they are not above taking valuable hints, and in some of the theatres of Yokohama many of our modern stage effects are being introduced. Much of their scenery is very beautiful. It is generally painted on rice paper, but they use curtains and hangings a great deal more than we do. The Japanese plays are almost as long as the Chinese, and some take weeks in performance. This is due, however, more to the interspersed entertainments than to the story of the play. In many cases the plot of a piece will be entirely suspended during a week's performance, while some grand fete, in which singing, dancing, music, acrobatism and jugglery are the principal features, will hold the stage. As a rule performances begin in the morning and last till midnight. There are refreshment stands in the auditorium, but, as I said before, you can go out on your feet and 'pass in on your shoes.' The Japanese actors are extremely clever, as may be imagined when I tell you that nearly every man in the company can play women's roles. There are no actresses. The power of the best actors over their audiences is extraordinary. I have seen the whole audience weeping with the sorrows of the heroine or rising en masse to threaten the villain. Their dramatic literature is very extensive, as they have tragedies, comedies historical plays and even farces."

Negro Superstitions.

The sun shining bright on the wedding day indicates storms after marriage, as pleasure cannot always last.

Never, even in basting, put a stitch of black thread in a white garment, or that needle will ere long be wanted in making a shroud

If a person carries an ax, hoe or spade into the house on his shoulder, the house is doomed thenceforth unless the culprit walks backward out of the house.

A garment accidentally put on with the seams outside must be worn so till it is no longer fit to be worn, or else presented to a friend, provided always that the friend is not a relation.

There is a beautiful belief extant among them. They believe when our earthly course is almost spent, and the death dews are gathering on brow and lips, the departed soul can bear a message to friends on the other side.

If the young moon is at first seen through the branches of a tree, the beholder is in danger unless he or she will immediately turn three somersaults in the air, which agile feat is rather hard to accomplish, especially by some of the corpulent negroes of the present day.

Her Dilemma.

I am only a farmer's girl,
John is only a farmer's lad,
But, somehow, when we chance to meet,
The very sound of his coming feet
Can make my heart so glad
That up to my cheeks the warm blush flies,
And he reads his welcome in my eyes.

I am only a farmer's girl,
Master Tom is the Squire's son,
But, strange to tell, his feet this way
Turn often toward the close of day,
And after the chores are done,
When John the passes the meadow gate
Gives me a scowl, and—will not wait.

I am only a farmer's girl,
So what can the Squire want of me?
My heart is John's; John knows it well;
But it isn't for me the truth to tell—
So bashful a lad is he.
So the Squire may come and the Squire may go,
But all the answer he'll get is "No!"

The Squire praises my hair and eyes;
The Squire says I'm a lady born—
What care I for his foolish speech?
'Tis John's voice only my heart can teach
To sing like birds at morn;
But John is a jealous, foolish boy,
And my days are shorn of half their joy.

Oh, I am only a farmer's girl,
And John is only a farmer's lad,
But I'd rather be in his humble life
Than be a "lady" as Squire's wife,
With a restless heart and sad!
But John—so bashful a boy is he!
Is a long while asking my heart of me

MALLEABLE GLASS.

It Will Revolutionize Housekeeping in th Future.

What is this dirt you sweep up, anyway? asks a writer in the St. Louis Globe. The queerest stuff imaginable. Should you burn it in the passage, its candescence would show, with the spectroscope, lines indicating almost all known substances. The iron lines would indicate the wear from the nails in your shoes. The carbon lines would come from the coal dust, and the yellow salt lines would only show that chloride of sodium is always present everywhere. But where you have old wall papers, or old carpets, you can be sure that some of this dust is several generations old: and if there be not some bacteria of a bad sort, and germs of old fevers with all the rest, I shall be surprised. You have only to mildly exercise your imagination to see minute personal relics of all the visitors you have had; and, indeed, your broom will swish all the fiercer when you think of it. I do not like such accumulations, nor do I like the necessity of sweeping my neighbors out of doors. So I say, as our first reform, let us have hardwood floors and, as far as possible, wainscoted walls. There is no artistic requirement that demands so much plaster, or paste, or paper on our room walls. Better still, we will soon have our walls of malleable glass—and our floors also. One is always getting born a little too soon. Yes, there is no knowing how many good things we are ourselves too soon for. Think how it would have been had we been born before window glass was known, and before—but bless me! we came very near being born before coal, and matches, and kerosene, and ranges, and telephones, and railroads, and nearly everything else, including sewing machines. And we are certainly ahead of a great many other fine things. How could we have been so foolish? One can never be too deliberate about such things. And as for malleable glass, I could wait ten generations to let it get the start of me. It is sure to come. Our floors will then be sweet and clean at the least possible outlay of labor, and our walls will need no decorations except that which is part of the glass itself.

Marrying for Spiritualistic Revenue.

Men marry sometimes for various reasons and sometimes for no reason at all, but a Brooklyn dentist assumed the bonds of matrimony not long ago in order that he might transform his bride into a medium. He was convinced that she possessed spiritualistic powers that, when properly developed, would astonish the world, and, in an incidental way, bring wealth to his pocketbook. Hitherto money had literally come to him like pulling teeth, and he believed that plugging the public with spirits could be made more profitable than plugging their molars with gold. He thought, too, that it might be the means of lifting him into an "upper set," as it were, although he couldn't determine at once what set of spirits his bride would be the medium for presenting him to. As soon as the knot was tied the dentist introduced his wife in spiritualistic circles and commenced the work of development. But the young bride didn't fancy sitting in a darkened room every day with vinegar-faced women and bald-headed old men to learn the mystery of raps and spirit voices. It wasn't her idea of a honeymoon at all. She expressed a decided aversion to cabinets and jingling bells and tamborines frisking about in the air. She went so far as to say that she wouldn't lecture on spiritualism or anything else, and soon there was a rupture between her and her husband. Finding that threats and intimidations had no effect upon what he styled her obstinacy, he suddenly quit her and his dentistry practice together and left for parts unknown. And now the lady is suing for a divorce, and the general impression is she will get it.

A Veracious Man.

Wife—What time did you get in last night, John?

Husband—Two o'clock, my dear.

Wife—Where were you, John?

Husband—At work at the office, my dear.

Wife—That's right, John, never tell a lie. (To the servant)—Mary, take Mr. Brown's shoes off the mantlepiece and get his night-key out of the clock and put it in his pocket.

The Powers That Be.

Mrs. Gorham Ware—Henry, I wish you would please not smoke around the house any more.

Mr. Gorham Ware—Why, my love, you've often said you rather fancied a good cigar!

Mrs. Gorham Ware—I know it, dear, but—the cook objects, and I'd like to keep our name out of the courts, you know.—Puck.

Hard to Suit.

A man in Chicago has just asked for a divorce from his wife because, though living in the house with him, she has kept silent for three years. It's no use trying to satisfy a man, anyway.

WON BY A COW.

She Eats Some Hay Just in Time to Win $500,000 for a Poor Farmer.

In September, 1871, Griffith Jones, a farmer of Forestport, Oneida county, purchased at tax sale a tract of 360 acres of land in the town of Alleghany, Cattaraugus county, says an Olean (N. Y.), letter to the New York Sun. The tract was wild and barren, in an isolated region, and its owner, James Hill, had ceased paying taxes on it and had removed from it. Jones, who was a man of limited means, paid $150 for the property, but after visiting it he concluded that it was not worth putting any more money in, and he paid no more attention to the purchase beyond securing his tax deed on the 23rd of September, 1873, two years after the date of the purchase, which gave him legal title to the land. In 1879 petroleum was discovered in Alleghany. Hill assumed control again of the tract he had abandoned, and transferred it to the Bradford Oil Company. This company drilled wells on the tract, and it proved to be a valuable and large producer of oil. Jones was ignorant of the sudden great value the tract he held the deed for had been given by the oil discovery until 1880, when it had yielded more than $300,000 worth of oil, and was still a great producer. Jones brought suit against the oil company in the Cattaraugus County Court to regain possession of the tract and for an accounting for the oil that had been taken from it and sold for the profit of the company. The company disputed Jones' title to the property in the clause in the tax sale law of New York State, which makes a tax deed invalid if the purchaser does not serve on the occupant of premises bought at tax sale notice to redeem the same within two years. The oil company asserted that Hill was occupying the premises when the deed was passed to Jones, and received no redemption notice within the required time, and the occupancy was claimed as the novel point of law, that although Hill was not living on the tract, he had left a quantity of hay in a shanty on the place when he moved off of it, which gave him legal domicile. This was the entire defence to the suit, and the Cattaraugus Court decided that if the simple fact of there being hay on the place, as claimed, could be established, it would be ample proof of occupancy in law, and would destroy Jones' title to the property. The trial resulted in favor of the oil company in 1882. A new trial was granted, and Jones proved by six witnesses that on the 22nd of September, 1873, one day before he became entitled to the property under the tax deed, Hill's cow had entered the shanty and eaten all the hay that Hill left there, thus depriving Hill of legal domicile, and leaving no one in occupancy on the premises of whom redemption notice could be served. By this act of Hill's cow Jones' title to the property was established, and Jones obtained a verdict for an accounting for the oil, which amounted to nearly $500,000. The oil company obtained an order for a new trial, but Jones was again successful, and his judgment was affirmed by the General Term, and a decision had just been given by the Court of Appeals sustaining all the points in the case in favor of Jones.

Chauncey Depew and the Cemetery.

A few days ago Mr. Depew, one of the prospective candidates for the United States Republican Presidential nomination, made a speech in Detroit, in which the following funny passage occurred: There is one thing about a Western town—I mean away up in the Northwest—that pleases me beyond anything in the United States. I do love in the annual tour that I make to strike, away up a thousand miles from here, a booming town where everybody has got rich in reality, and profoundly rich in imagination, where lots are selling at $2,000 the front foot one day and $4,000 the next day. I stood last fall in one of those towns up near the Arctic circle, upon a lot which had sold the day before for $4,000 a front foot, or more than they charge on Fifth avenue in New York. The proprietor of it took me out on the lake to show me the city, for, he said, "the mud is so deep in the streets I cannot show it to you in any other way." (Laughter.) And as he was pointing out this lot and telling me the marvellous prices they had brought, I said to him: "You seem to have everything but a cemetery. Is it because land is so scarce here that you throw your dead into the lake?" "Oh, no," said he. "Where you see that solitary white stone up yonder was the cemetery, but it became so valuable we had to dig them up and plant them over the hill. But it was not an unmixed evil, for the principal avenue ran right by my lot and made it a corner one. I had to take up my wife, but, dear old girl, she would have enjoyed it if she could have known about it, because she was always wild about the growth of the town." (Prolonged laughter.)

The Bloody Shirt.

The origin of the phrase, "The bloody shirt," is in a Corsican custom, now nearly, if not quite, obsolete. In the days of the fierce vendette—the feuds which divided Corsican family from family—bloodshed was a common occurrence. Before the burial of a murdered man the gridata was celebrated. This word, which literally means a crying aloud, may be translated "a wake." The body of the victim was laid upon a plank; his useless firearms were placed near his hand, and his blood-stained shirt was hung above his head. Around the rude bier sat a circle of women, wrapped in their black mantles, who rocked to and fro with strange wailings. The men, relatives and friends of the murdered man, fully armed, stood around the room, mad with thirst for revenge. Then one of the women—the wife or mother or sister of the dead man—with a sharp scream, would snatch the bloody shirt, and, waving it aloft, begin the vocero—the lamentation. This rythmic discourse was made up of alternate expressions of love for the dead and hatred of his enemies; and its startling images and tremendous curses were echoed in the faces and mutterings of the armed mourners.

Wanted a Powerful Dose.

This is the order which a little girl brought into a Lewiston druggist's store the other day. It was written on a dirty piece of note-paper, as follows: "Mister Druggist; Please send ipecac enough to throw up a 4-year-old girl."—Lewiston Journal.

GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

THE WORLD-FAMED LIVER, BLOOD AND LUNG REMEDY.

WHAT AILS YOU?

[COPYRIGHT, 1887.]

ARE YOU SICK?

Do you feel dull, languid, low-spirited, lifeless, and indescribably miserable, both physically and mentally; experience a sense of fullness or bloating after eating, or of "goneness," or emptiness of stomach in the morning, tongue coated, bitter or bad taste in mouth, irregular appetite, dizziness, frequent headaches, blurred eyesight, "floating specks" before the eyes, nervous prostration or exhaustion, irritability of temper, hot flushes, alternating with chilly sensations, sharp, biting, transient pains here and there, cold feet, drowsiness after meals, wakefulness, or disturbed and unrefreshing sleep, constant, indescribable feeling of dread, or of impending calamity?

If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common of American maladies—Bilious Dyspepsia, or Torpid Liver, associated with Dyspepsia, or Indigestion. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. PIERCE'S GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY will subdue it, if taken according to directions for a reasonable length of time. If not cured, complications multiply and Consumption of the Lungs, Skin Diseases, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Kidney Disease, or other grave maladies are quite liable to set in, and, sooner or later, induce a fatal termination.

DR. PIERCE'S GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY acts powerfully upon the Liver, and through that great blood-purifying organ, cleanses the system of all blood-taints and impurities, from whatever cause arising. It is equally efficacious in acting upon the Kidneys, and other excretory organs, cleansing, strengthening, and healing their diseases. As an appetizing, restorative tonic, it promotes digestion and nutrition, thereby building up both flesh and strength. In malarial districts, this wonderful medicine has gained great celebrity in curing Fever and Ague, Chills and Fever, Dumb Ague, and kindred diseases.

BILIOUS ATTACK.

DAVID G. LOWE, Esq., of St. Agathe, Manitoba, Canada, says: "Being troubled with a terrible bilious attack, fluttering of the heart, poor rest at night, etc., I commenced the use of your 'Golden Medical Discovery' and 'Pellets,' and derived the very highest benefit therefrom."

LIVER DISEASE.

MRS. I. V. WEBBER, of Yorkshire, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., writes: "For five years previous to taking 'Golden Medical Discovery' and 'Pellets,' I was a great sufferer; had a severe pain in my right side continually; was unable to do my own work. I am now well and strong."

"FOR THE BLOOD IS THE LIFE."

Thoroughly cleanse the blood, which is the fountain of health, by using DR. PIERCE'S GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY, and good digestion, a fair skin, buoyant spirits, and bodily health and vigor will be established.

GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY cures all humors, from a common Blotch, or Eruption, to the worst Scrofula. Salt-rheum, "Fever-sores," Scaly or Rough Skin, in short, all diseases caused by bad blood, are conquered by this powerful, purifying, and invigorating medicine. Great Eating Ulcers rapidly heal under its benign influence. Virulent blood-poisons are, by its use, robbed of their terrors. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, Hip-Joint Disease, "White Swellings," Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands.

A medicine possessing the power to cure such inveterate blood and skin diseases as the following testimonial portrays, must certainly be credited with possessing properties capable of curing any and all skin and blood diseases, for none are more obstinate or difficult of cure than Salt-rheum.

SALT-RHEUM AND RHEUMATISM.

"COLUMBUS, OHIO, Aug. 18th, 1887.
WORLD'S DISPENSARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, 663 Main Street, Buffalo, N. Y.:

Gentlemen—For several years I have felt it to be my duty to give to you the facts in relation to the complete cure of a most aggravated case of salt-rheum, by the use of your 'Golden Medical Discovery.' An elderly lady relative of mine had been a great sufferer from salt-rheum for upwards of forty years. The disease was most distressing in her hands, causing the skin to crack open on the inside of the fingers at the joints and between the fingers. She was obliged to protect the raw places by means of adhesive plasters, salves, ointments and bandages, and during the winter months had to have her hands dressed daily. The pain was quite severe at times and her general health was badly affected, paving the way for other diseases to creep in. Catarrh and rheumatism caused a great deal of suffering in addition to the salt-rheum. She had used faithfully, and with the most commendable perseverance, all the remedies prescribed by her physicians, but without obtaining relief. She afterwards began treating herself by drinking teas made from blood-purifying roots and herbs. She continued this for several years but derived no benefit. Finally, about ten years ago, I chanced to read one of Dr. Pierce's small pamphlets setting forth the merits of his 'Golden Medical Discovery' and other medicines. The name struck my fancy, and seeing that it was essentially a blood-purifier, I immediately recommended it to the old lady who had been so long a sufferer from salt-rheum. She commenced taking it at once, and took one bottle, but seemed to be no better. However, I realized that it would take time for any medicine to effect a change for the better, and encouraged her to continue. She then purchased a half-a-dozen bottles, and before these had all been used she began to notice an improvement. After taking about a dozen bottles she was entirely cured. Her hands were perfectly well and as smooth and healthy as a child's. Her general health was also greatly improved; the rheumatism entirely left her, and the catarrh was almost cured, so that it ceased to be much annoyance. She has enjoyed excellent health from that day to this, and has had no return of either salt-rheum or rheumatism. The 'Discovery' seems to have entirely eradicated the salt-rheum from her system. She is now over eighty years old, and very healthy for one of such extreme age.

I have written this letter, of which you can make any use you see fit, hoping that some sufferer from salt-rheum might chance to read it and obtain relief by using your 'Golden Medical Discovery'—for 'Golden' it is in its curative properties, and as much above the multitude of nostrums and so-called 'patent medicines,' so zealously flaunted before the public, as gold is above the baser metals.

Respectfully yours,
F. W. WHEELER, 182 21st St."

CONSUMPTION, WEAK LUNGS, SPITTING OF BLOOD.

GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY cures Consumption (which is Scrofula of the Lungs), by its wonderful blood-purifying, invigorating and nutritive properties. For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Shortness of Breath, Bronchitis, Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Severe Coughs, Asthma, and kindred affections, it is a sovereign remedy. While it promptly cures the severest Coughs, it strengthens the system and purifies the blood.

CONSUMPTION.

SOLOMON BUTTS, of North Clayton, Miami Co., Ohio, writes: "I have not the words to express my gratitude for the good your 'Golden Medical Discovery' has done my wife. She was taken with consumption, and after trying one doctor after another I finally gave up all hope of relief. Being very poor and having but one dollar in the world, I prayed to God that he might show me something; and then it seems as though something did tell me to get your 'Golden Medical Discovery.' My wife took it as directed, and as a result she is so she can work now."

COUGH OF FIVE YEARS' STANDING.

MRS. N. W. RICE, of Newfane, Vermont, says: "I feel at liberty to acknowledge the benefit I received from two bottles of the 'Golden Medical Discovery,' which cured a cough of five years' standing, and dyspepsia, from which I had suffered for a long time. I have also used Dr. Pierce's Extract of Smart-Weed, or Water Pepper, in my family, with good effect."

GAINED 25 POUNDS.

Wasting Disease.—WATSON F. CLARKE, Esq., of (Box 109), Summerside, Prince Edward Island, Can., writes: "When I commenced taking your 'Golden Medical Discovery,' I was not able to work and was a burden to myself. At that time I weighed 122 pounds, and to-day I weigh 147 pounds. Then I used to eat about one meal a day, and now can eat four or five if I dared to."

WORTH $1000 A BOTTLE.

W. R. DAVIS, Esq., of Bellville, Florida, writes: "I have taken your wonderful 'Golden Medical Discovery' and have been cured of consumption. I am now sound and well, and have only spent three dollars, and I would not take three thousand dollars and be put back where I was."

Discovery $1.00, Six Bottles for $5.00; by Druggists.

WOOD CARVING.

A New Fad That Brings Money to the Devotee.

Wood carving is the newest feminine fad. Brass hammering is going out, wood carving is coming in. Instead of punching plaques women are cutting wood panels. The passion for carved hall and dining-room furniture and for wood over-mantels has something to do with starting the craze. The tools are easily handled also, and require little muscular strength, only a quick eye, an artistic feeling and a steady hand. It is the proper thing to design and carve the two halves of the bellows for the open fire; put a naked child on them, say, blowing the red coals in a cave of the winds; or to cut ornaments for the great oak chest that mediæval moderns are reviving chold their wardrobes. There are several classes in wood carving, and many ladies are taking private lessons. There is a niece of Charles Sumner who became quite an expert, but she has rooms in a hotel and has given up her work because the noise of it disturbed her neighbors. A sister-in-law of Horace Greeley, a woman of 76, is one of the enthusiasts, talking it up as Cato did Greek in her old age. Her favorite piece of work is a carved settle for her hall, and she takes great pride in it. Smaller pieces of work are the rule, panels and tiles for the side of the mantel and the like, but carved desks, sideboards and large decorative pieces are not beyond the ambition of the more aspiring. One of the successful wood carvers and designers of the city has it in mind, if possible, to found a school for instruction in wood carving, for the teaching of young women especially, for whom he believes there is an outlook for paying work in this line. One of his pupils, indeed a girl of perseverance and talent, has supported herself comfortably this winter by taking pupils herself, and has devoted so much originality and independent skill that she has obtained a good commission for carvings and interior decorative woodwork for a number of residences to be built by rich New Yorkers this summer. If the taste for wood carving continues to increase it will supply an occupation in which women who go into it for something more than amusement will find, if they are artists, one more welcome resource.—New York Mail.

Eyes and no Eyes.

Husband—"Have the couple who just moved into the house next door any children?"

Wife—"Children? They've only been married a day or two."

"How do you know?"

"Before he started down town this morning he kissed her, and he didn't act as if he was afraid he'd get hit if he didn't."

The Canary Bird Snored.

Miss Almeda Taft, of Sadorus, Ill., has a canary bird that snores. About 2 o'clock one night last week its snores became so loud as to arouse the household. A search about the premises failed to reveal the cause of the noise until the sitting-room door was opened and it was found to emanate from the bird-cage. The bird being awakened, the noise instantly ceased. The owner of the bird regards it now as a very musical canary, and the neighbors all declare they never heard the like of its snores, which become more pronounced with each succeeding day.

Symptoms of Catarrh.

A profuse and many times excessively offensive discharge, with "stopping up" of the nose at times, impairment of the sense of smell and taste, watering or weak eyes, impaired hearing, irregular appetite, occasional nausea, pressure and pain over the eyes, and at times in the back of the head, occasional chilly sensations, cold feet, and a feeling of lassitude and debility, are symptoms which are common to catarrh, yet all of them are not present in every case. Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures catarrh in its worst forms and stages. It is pleasant to use, and contains no poisonous or caustic drugs. Of druggists, for 50 cents.

Agricultural Athletics.

Aunt Priscilla—You're getting positively lazy, Laura. If you don't care to read, why don't you exercise?

Laura—I am utterly discouraged, auntie. I sent for a hand-book on fencing yesterday and the stupid book clerk returned a copy of "Wire Barbing for the Farm."

Woman as a Martyr.

History records the sufferings of countless martyrs, and we read of them with wonder and sympathy. But there are living to-day in our midst thousands of other martyrs who have far stronger claims upon our consideration—women who are sufferers from those ailments peculiar to their sex, our wives, daughters and sisters, perhaps, whose lives are an unremitting round of suffering. "Is there no relief?" they cry. Yes, there is; Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription will remove that "dragging-down" feeling, will banish that backache, will restore every function to its normal condition. To all sufferers from female complaints—and their name is Legion—we say: get the "Prescription" at once; it will be worth far more than its weight in gold to you.

Dr. George Beer, of Montreal, has been appointed lecturer on dentistry for final students at McGill University.

Very Funny.

Husband—"I see that the papers are calling attention to the absurd way in which people say "Isn't it funny?" whenever they hear anything funny or pathetic."

Wife—"Yes, I've noticed that ridiculous habit myself; isn't it funny that people should be so foolish?"

A Voluntary Statement.

The writer of this paragraph once had an elder and only brother. Brought up together, we were almost inseparable, hopeful and ambitious. Exposure planted the seeds of consumption in the elder, and in a few weeks, in the month of May, "good store of flowers were stuck round his winding-sheet." Every attention and every remedy that love could give or obtain were unavailing. Since that sad day, I have learned, through the most trustworthy authority and from experience in its use, that a real remedy now exists, that of Dr Pierce, called the "Golden Medical Discovery." A thousand pities that it was not discovered ages ago, but how thankful the present generation should be that it can now avail itself of so potent a remedy.

A petition for the rehearing of the Bell Telephone patent cases was filed in the Supreme Court at Washington yesterday.

Failure Impossible

When Polson's NERVILINE is used for pain. It matters not of how long standing it may be, or how often other remedies have failed to afford relief, Nerviline, the great pain cure, does its work promptly. Buy a 10 cent sample bottle, and try it for internal or external pains. You will be convinced of its extraordinary power in relieving pain. Ten cent bottles and large bottles 25 cents, at all druggists. Take no substitute.

Jimmy's son was tried for the murder, but he was acquitted. Many suspected that Jimmy knew something about the tragic affair, but if he did he died with the secret untold. His remains were interred in the Forest Lawn cemetery on Tuesday afternoon.—[Dufferin Post.

Mr. Davidson has completed the assessment of Thornbury. The total value of real and personal property amounts to $224,685. Last year it was over $217,000, showing a slight increase this year. The total population of the Town this year is only 809. Last year it was 996. This shows a great falling off. School children between the ages of 5 and 16 inclusive is 238. Total value of non-res. property is $1,785. The decrease in the population of Thornbury is even more marked than in Meaford.—[Thornbury Standard.

For ways that are dark and tricks that are vain commend us to an Orangeville tavern-keeper. Brown, a Broadway east liquor vendor, sold some hay to Mr. Calvin Peters previous to the Scott Act vote. When Mr. Peters came for the hay the day after the vote he was refused and set upon by the tavern-keeper's foulmouth abuse, because forsooth, he had dared to vote for the Scott Act. This is but one case of which we could mention scores of similar ones; all of which goes to prove our contention that the Orangeville tavern-keeper is pretty small potatoes.—[Dufferin Advertiser.

Mr. W. F. McLean, publisher of the Toronto World, who is earnestly endeavoring to bring about a much-needed reform in Canadian butter-making, is talked of as a possible candidate for parliamentary honors in Cardwell. The editor of The Economist spent considerable time on Tuesday in endeavoring to find some good butter in Shelburne, but he failed to find a bit—some offered being almost poisonous—and if Billy McLean's election in Cardwell will result in bringing good butter out of Mono and stop whiskey from going into it, then we shall support him heartily.—[Shelburne Economist.

In chronic diseases, medicines should be restoring, and not debilitating, in their action. The wonderful strengthening and curative effects, realized from the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, sustain the reputation of this remedy as the most popular blood purifier.

Rev. Mr. Buggins of Markdale, occupied the pulpit of the Methodist church here morning and evening last Sunday, preached excellent sermons on both occasions.

The furnal sermon in connection with the death of Mrs. Mackenzie Duncan, of Eugenia, was preached in the Methodist church here by Rev. Mr. Buggins, of Markdale, Sunday morning last, from the words, "The spirit shall return unto God who gave it."—Eccles. 12c. 7v. The distinction between soul and body was clearly set forth, and numerous quotations from Scripture were given endorsing the speaker's interpretation. At the close of the sermon, Dr. Christoe delivered an affecting address relative to the conversion of deceased.

REMOVED.—The undersigned has removed to his New Shop on Collingwood street—next door to Sullivan's tin shop—and is better than ever prepared to give prompt and satisfactory attention to all orders entrusted to him in the Boot & Shoe line. Yours truly, JOSEPH SMITH, Boot & Shoemaker, Flesherton.

A Bank in Flesherton.

We have much pleasure in announcing in THE ADVANCE that a Bank will be established in Flesherton in the course of a few weeks. This will be a great convenience to the general public and is one of the many indications of the steady and substantial growth of our town. We have no hesitation in saying that the Flesherton bank (in futuro) will do an extensive and safe business.

Concert.

The evening of the 24th proved an interesting and enjoyable one to those who attended the concert in the Town Hall, Flesherton, under the auspices of the L. A. Presbyterian church. Rev. A. Wilson occupied the chair in his usual pleasant manner. The popular Glee Club and the newly organized Orchestra distinguished themselves in the selections so well rendered. The soloists were Miss Philips, of Dundalk, Miss VanDusen, Miss Armstrong, Miss Christoe, and Mr. J. R. Anderson.

Another Editor.

A correspondent from a certain town in the County of Grey says:—The Editor of our paper was out driving with his best girl the other evening. He hired a horse from the livery, and it appears that both lady and gentleman enjoyed the ride very much. The Editor left the lady at her own door on the return trip, brought the horse to the livery stable and tied it outside, expecting some one to come along and put it in. He then wended his way homewards. Next morning the horse was discovered by the liveryman just where the Editor had left him tied outside the night before!

A Scaly Transaction.

It appears several young Fleshertonians went out a couple of weeks ago to the Beaver River to camp and fish. All went well until one of them—who, by the way, does not work more than a hundred miles from Russell's Jewelry store—managed to get his hook caught on a very large trout—so large was the fish that his companion stood gazing with staring eyes and wondering which would come out best. He did not have to wait long, as with one terrible plunge the fish started off and—well, when last seen the young man was wading in about five feet of water for the shore, not all pleased with immersion.

An Interesting Feature.

The Superintendent of the Methodist Sabbath School, Squire Armstrong, has introduced an excellent feature in connection with the S. S. viz., the Teachers are expected to take up the lesson each Sunday in turn, questioning the pupils thereupon, and, at the same time, giving utterance to their own opinions. Last Sunday the Squire called upon Mrs. J. W. Shilton to take her turn in addressing the school, which she did in a most pleasant and instructive manner. Her pointed comments, simple yet pithy questions, and pleasing address at once secured the closest attention of adults as well as juveniles. A gentleman, who was present, said he was charmed and delighted with the splendid manner in which the lesson was handled from beginning to close. Many expressed the wish that Mrs. J. W. Shilton's "turn" might often occur.

Will the Editor please inform the public who is the owner of the wood pile on the street opposite Heard's Carriage Shop, & what steps are necessary to take in order to have such a nuisance removed?

To the Editor of The Advance.

Dear Sir,—Complaint has been made to me that on the Evening of Sunday, last, a number of young men indulged in bathing in Flesher's mill pond—young men from whom better would be expected—I wish to call the attention of the offenders to sections numbers Eight & Nine of By-Law No. 282, for the Regulation of Public Morals, which reads as follows:—

8.—That no person shall indecently expose his or her person in any public place or make any other indecent Exhibitions whatever.

9.—That no person shall bathe or wash his or her person in any river, lake or pond in the municipality where such bathing or washing would expose him or her to any public street, or any public or private dwelling. I need hardly refer to the penalty clause which enacts that offenders shall be fined from one to twenty Dollars at the discretion of the Convicting Justice. I wish the young men & boys to govern themselves by the above; failing to do so, my duty shall be plain.

Yours,
JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, J. P.

IRISH HOME RULERS.

What They Say Regarding the Papal Rescript.

IMPORTANT RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED

A Dublin despatch says: The Exchequer Court has dismissed the appeal of Father McFadden, of Gweedore, against the doubling of his sentence on appeal. The court held that a County Court has the power to increase a sentence.

Forty Parnellites, including Messrs. Dillon and O'Brien, sat nine hours in the Mansion House yesterday discussing the Papal rescript. A sub-committee was appointed, consisting of Messrs. D. Sullivan, T. D. Sullivan, O'Brien, Redmond, Healey and Harrington, with Messrs. Kenny and Clancy as secretaries, to draw up resolutions on the principles agreed to. The meeting prepared a manifesto to the following effect:

Being aware that the Papal rescript is being used by the enemies of the Holy See and of the Irish people to the prejudice of the Irish cause, to estrange the people and their spiritual guides, and to increase the dangers which threaten the people, and being mindful of our obligations to the Holy See and of our duty as constitutional elected representatives, we have thought it well to come together and adopted the resolution:

That the investigations of last year, as to the circumstances to our knowledge at present before court, we venture to affirm, have been prompted under the authority of the Holy Office, on statements so prejudicial to the Irish people had been [illegible] Irish prelates and the [illegible] people.

That the assertion [illegible] privileges as to the [illegible] except in matters [illegible] unfounded and [illegible] by the fact that [illegible] legislation for [illegible] years has proceeded upon the [illegible] free action.

Further, to refute the inception that [illegible] known as the Plan of Campaign [illegible] ent Tory Government have been [illegible] a statute for the purpose of [illegible] hundred tenants [illegible] ground that they were [illegible]

That the [illegible] ation and [illegible] rent fixing courts [illegible] made [illegible] the statement that they can [illegible] bring them within the limits of [illegible] provisions [illegible] the crops [illegible] predominance [illegible] time to [illegible] ments.

That no provision is made [illegible] arrears of rents, which [illegible] courts to be [illegible] landlords by the [illegible] tents to their [illegible] large numbers [illegible]

With regard to [illegible] been extorted and [illegible] sons, we affirm [illegible] their rents with [illegible] held as an insurance [illegible] they were invariably [illegible] at the request of the tenants.

That the unjust and [illegible] of the penal power of evictions for [illegible] the lives of the Irish people and hundreds of the tenants in their country, and the legal power of evictions armed with [illegible] thereby an [illegible] in a legislature [illegible] by tenants, who are [illegible] the present moment to [illegible] of farmers together with the [illegible] their agreements to [illegible] the [illegible] of the soil [illegible] because that [illegible] of the [illegible] and that [illegible] cases [illegible] course [illegible] people by their [illegible] Christendom, which [illegible] the [illegible]

Second, that we [illegible] that [illegible] tenants [illegible] equitable [illegible] landowners [illegible] that [illegible] prevailed [illegible]

Third, [illegible] regard to [illegible] the [illegible] one [illegible]

Fourth, that the enactment of the Irish people [illegible] and [illegible] by [illegible] sustained by natural justice and conducted [illegible] modes of action, methods of organization prescribed or allowed by the constitution, to which the Irish people owe what ever [illegible] civil and religious freedom, that the force of this national movement against [illegible] and coercion and organized calumny will continue to be exerted until we shall have achieved success.

Sixth, while unreservedly acknowledging the spiritual jurisdiction of the Holy See, we, as guardians of those civil liberties which our Catholic forefathers resolutely defended, feel bound to solemnly reassert that the Irish Catholics can recognize no right of the Holy See to interfere with the Irish people in the management of their political affairs.

DISTRACTED BY SALVATIONISTS.

How a Rich Manufacturer Gave up all and Followed the Lassies.

An Atlanta, Ga., despatch says: The Salvation Army is playing havoc with family circles in Atlanta, and no end of divorce suits among respectable people have grown out of its presence here. Mr. W. S. Withers, a prominent business man who owned large iron works in the city, has become so infatuated with the army that he has quit business entirely, having put out the fires in his furnaces and closed his shops. He has been the chief support of the army, having paid the rent of the halls and fed the soldiers. He has gone to Brooklyn, it is said, to confer with the army leaders, and he hopes to transplant Colonel Light, who has entire charge of the army in the South. His family, who move in Atlanta's best society circles, are utterly prostrated, and his wife has implored Governor Gordon to interfere in some way in her behalf.

A Rival for the Welland Canal.

A New York despatch says: The committee of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation to which was referred the consideration of Congressman Nutting's Niagara Ship Canal Bill has prepared a resolution to the effect that the Board favors an appropriation by Congress of a sum not exceeding $15,000 to provide for the survey and estimates of cost by United States engineers of a ship canal connecting Lakes Erie and Ontario, on the American side, of a sufficient capacity to float such vessels as will be able to pass the Sault Ste. Marie.

Eva Wentz, a little Baltimore girl, whose birthday falls on the same day of the year as that of Bismarck, wrote him a letter of congratulation on his last anniversary. She has received an autograph reply, in which the great Chancellor says: "For your friendly congratulation on the occasion of my birthday I return my sincere thanks.—VON BISMARCK."

WAR PREPARATIONS.

Russia Undoubtedly Arming With a Purpose—Will the Czar Attack Austria?

A Berlin cablegram says: The Russian preparations are most ominous. The news of the week is to the effect that Russia has accepted the French syndicate's terms for a loan. M. Vyshnigradski, Russian Minister of Finance, first ruptured the negotiations with the Comptoir d'Escompte, angrily rejecting the proposals as a slur upon Russia's solvency. Though the details of the negotiations which have been concluded are meagre, enough is known to show that M. Vyshnigradski felt the pinch and submitted to the syndicate's condition. The Russian Treasury obtains an immediate advance of £13,600,000. The total loan amounts to £11,000,000 and the balance will be issued in the autumn if the time is opportune.

The Russian activities centre in the meantime in Southern Russia. Masked batteries are being rapidly constructed along the shores of the Black Sea, between the mouth of the Dniester and Odessa, and immense stores of munitions are being collected at Odessa, where even the premises of the yacht club are brought into requisition as a store and coaling point. The two strategic lines leading to the Austrian frontier will not be completed before July. The Austrian strategic railways in Galicia have completed their enabling projects.

Latest Northwest News.

A despatch from Winnipeg dated last (Friday) night says: The Legislature prorogued this evening at 6 with the usual ceremonies. Governor Aikens' speech congratulated the House on the passage of the Redistribution Bill, the Manhood Suffrage Bill, the adoption of the Quebec resolutions, the cessation of the disallowance policy and the legislation for the promotion of railway enterprises.

Mr. Clarke, an aspirant for parliamentary honors in Prince Albert, was brought in to night a raving maniac.

Forty Indians and squaws, engaged by a Yankee quack medicine man at Selkirk to travel as an advertisement through the States, were to start this morning, but the agent didn't put in an appearance and Lo went home disgusted.

O Connor Power arrive here to day and leaves to morrow to visit the crofters near Morpeth.

Wheat has advanced 15 to 20 cents, and is now at 70 and 71. Winnipeg dealers hold about 3,000,000 bushels.

Mrs. Palen, of Clandboye, charges her husband with attempting to burn their residence. He has been arrested, but denies the accusation.

At the Conservative meeting to select a candidate for South Winnipeg to day, J. A. M. Aikens, George F. Galt, Hon. Mr. McMicken, Beverley Robertson and Messrs. Howell and Mulvey were nominated. The two latter declined, Messrs. Aikens and Galt were absent, Mr. McMicken accepted if nominated, and Mr. Robertson asked five days to consider. The meeting adjourned till Wednesday.

Lieut.-Gov. Aikens has declined to be a candidate.

The Mississippi in a Rage.

A St. Louis despatch says: The Mississippi River has been above the danger line for four days at Davenport, Iowa, and is steadily rising. Several manufacturing establishments have been compelled to close and many families living in the lower part of the city are moving as rapidly as possible. At Galena, Illinois, boats are now running all the business portion of the city. On the east side of Main street the water in many places is nearly up to the first floor. At Dubuque the river is within six inches of the high water mark. The damage already done is heavy. A majority of the manufacturing establishments have been obliged to shut down and many men are idle. At Keokuk, Iowa, the river has risen to such a depth over the track of the Keokuk & Northwestern Road as to compel the abandonment of train service between there and Quincy. Alexandria, five miles below Keokuk, is in danger of being submerged.

Smothered His Child Accidentally.

A New York despatch says: When John Hassler, aged 26, and his young wife and three children landed from the steamer Hamburg yesterday as immigrants from Holstein they repaired to the office of the Southern Pacific Railway to procure tickets for San Francisco. Mrs. Hassler wrapped up her 11 months old child in a blanket, laid it carefully on a seat, and went to attend to the other children. Hassler returned with the tickets, and sitting, as he thought, on the blanket, smothered the life out of his child. The husband was arrested, and the woman was frantic with grief at the loss of her child and the prospect of having her husband locked up in a strange country. Coroner Eidman, seeing the necessity of the case, heard the case at once and the jury acquitted the husband. They then proceeded west.

A Phenomenal Snowbank.

A Canajoharie, N.Y., despatch says: A remarkable snowbank remains on the farm of D. M. Shuler, in this township. It is 150 feet long, 10 to 50 feet wide and 6 feet deep. A creek runs beneath it, forming a bridge that a horse and waggon can pass over. An elm tree in full leaf stands in the centre of the snow. No snowbank has ever been known before at this point later than May 1st.

Frightful Fall of 600 Feet.

A Wilkesbarre, Pa., despatch says: Thomas Rhone, a carpenter employed at the Lehigh and Wilkesbarre company's mines, fell down the shaft, a distance of nearly 600 feet, this morning and was instantly killed. Every bone in his body was broken.

Wifely Wisdom.

"Oh, Mrs. De Beige, I don't know how you manage your husband so nicely. You drive him about just as if you had a bridle on him?"

NO CHINESE NEED APPLY.

Australia Will Have None of Them—Will Rather Rebel.

A London cable says: The question of the admission of Chinamen into Australia is daily becoming more puzzling and annoying to the Home Government. The Australians have refused to even admit Chinese who have been naturalized as British subjects at Hong Kong, and threaten to pass a law prohibiting any person of Chinese birth from landing at any port in the country, whether Lord Salisbury likes it or not. On the other hand, the Chinese Ambassador is vigorously protesting against the £10 per capita tax which is being imposed upon Chinamen already in the country, and Lord Salisbury can in the circumstances hardly avoid taking some definite action in the matter, with the inevitable result of precipitating a rupture with China or an Australian revolt against the Home Government. The Bill providing for the exclusion of Chinese of every condition in life is virtually an accomplished fact, since it has already been formulated and in the present temper of the Australian Parliament its introduction is equivalent to its passage. The latest advices from Australia include emphatic assurances that the country, including the Colonial Government, will rebel before it will submit to Imperial orders to admit Chinamen.

FIFTY-TWO DAYS WITHOUT FOOD.

A Woman Refuses to Eat, but is Strong Enough to Work.

A Lancaster, Pa., despatch says: Mrs. Weidler, the fasting woman, has reached the fifty second day of her fast. Some of the local physicians think some one has smuggled food to her, but her door has been barred, the transom nailed up and the only window is barred and three stories above the ground. The only keys to her room are in the keeping of Dr. Senening, the resident physician, and Mrs. Eaby, the ward tender, who is an experienced and reputable woman.

Mrs. Weidler entered the institution just one year ago to-day, being sent there because she was starving herself at home. For a time after she entered the hospital she would eat if she thought no one observed her. Finally she would not even do this, and for five months liquid food was forced through a stomach pump, the woman violently resisting, and it became necessary to bandage the poor woman and hold her down in order to feed her. This process was stopped fifty two days ago, and in all that time Mrs. Weidler has had no nourishment but water, drinking from half a pint to a pint daily. She was strong enough yesterday afternoon to scrub the floor of her room and set things to rights.

Navigability of Hudson's Straits.

A Winnipeg despatch says: The following extract from the private report to the Government by Captain Martham, who accompanied the expedition sent to Hudson's Bay to inquire into the navigability of the straits, was received here to-day from Ottawa: "There is certainly navigation every year for at least five months. Very often the straits are likely to be navigable the entire twelve months, and the ice is not heavy, being of the honeycombed character, which can be easily resisted by steamers built for navigating these waters." The report indicates that the testimony of the men who were placed at stations along the shore is quite worthless, as they never could tell from their position how the water was flowing in the open channel. In fact they could not see.

TYRANNY OF THINGS.

Forms of Slavery That is Never Likely to be Abolished.

When we went to war and put an end to negro slavery we did not succeed in getting rid of slavery. Property in persons was extinguished, but the slavery of persons to things was enlarged. Before he owned himself the negro did not have to look after a house to live in, clothes to wear or food to eat. That care devolved upon his master. Now he must take care of himself and share in the doom that fell upon Adam, who, after he left Eden, had the whole world to wander in and work in unmastered.

From the beginning of life to the end of it poor mortals, whether at the top or bottom or midway on the ladder of fortune, are subject to the constant tyranny of things. This is what we mean when we say "we are the creatures of circumstances." The helpless baby puling and kicking in its crib finds inert defiance and mastery in whatever he sees or touches. By what painful bumps and bruises does he acquire the knowledge that

> * * * I am not what I see,
> And other than the things I touch, and afterward that the whole category of things he touches are not his servants but his masters! They minister to him, not of their will, but by reason of his work. As he learns to think he learns to accommodate himself to his surroundings and he never stops until he returns to the dust of which he is a living portion.

When the lawyers invented the "chattel slavery" they covered the whole ground except in the limitation of the meaning "chattel," which in the legal lingo only refers to portable property and not to real estate. But the "tyranny of things" is beyond expression.

A cinder in the eye will shut out the charm of the loveliest landscape. A mosquito can take all the comfort and goodness out of a bedowned and tapestried couch at 4 o'clock in the morning. A hole in the heel of her stocking will check the delight of the giddiest girl in the maddest whirl of the dance. An undigested scrap in the stomach of my lord the king may make him sick of his royalty and of all the world. A misplaced comma may nullify the intent of a statute. A broken wire can snap in twain instantly the intercourse of nations. It was a chance shot and a poor one that brought down Achilles. The small sand of Sahara has baffled the march of civilization for ages.

Does the millionaire boss his millions, or has he millions of bosses? He cannot buy food with his money that will keep an even beam between waste and repair in his mortal soul. He can only eat his fill and no more, clothe himself finely like other men, go to bed at night and get up in the morning and pass his time in looking after his dollars to see that they shall not roll away from him. Few men alive have greater care upon their minds than the very rich man, and every dead man goes into the next world as rich as when he has done with it all and as much of a monarch as Emperor William, who had as rough a tussle with "things" while he lived as any hod carrier who carried his things, in the shape of bricks, the whole day long to waiting masons.

The true philosophy of life is only reached when the mastery of things is acknowledged and we no longer strive against it. Mr. Emerson, when he saw his library and manuscripts burning, was commiserated on his loss by the late Miss Alcott; but he did not break down. He looked sweetly at her and said: "It is a beautiful sight; let us enjoy it while we can." He had discovered the uselessness of kicking against the pricks and had submitted himself to the universal order.

All our quarrels, whether contentions of politics, religion, love or law, are in their end and scope but differences about things. We vex ourselves and fret and strut about a little and are then laid away to rest. The things endure.—Philadelphia Record.

Great Feats of Memory.

Idiots have been known whose memory of names and words was so retentive that they could repeat a sermon verbatim, and indicate where the preacher blew his nose and coughed while delivering it.

Grotius and Pascal forgot nothing they had ever read or thought. Cardinal Mezzofanti, the linguist, who is said to have known a hundred languages, declared that he never forgot a word he had once learned.

An English clergyman mentions a man who could remember the day of the burial of every person who had died in the parish during thirty five years, and could also repeat the name and age of each deceased person, and the names of the mourners at his funeral. But so weak was he intellectually that he could not be trusted to feed himself.

While Dr. John Leyden, the orientalist was in Calcutta, there arose a case which turned on the exact wording of an Act of Parliament. A copy of the Act could not be found, but Leyden, having read it before leaving England, made a copy from memory. Nearly a year after a printed copy of the Act arrived from London, and it was found to be identical with the transcript Leyden had made.

To a friend who congratulated Leyden on his remarkable memory, he replied that he often found it a source of great inconvenience. On the friend expressing surprise, he exclaimed that he had often wished to recollect a particular expression in something he had read, but could not do it until he had repeated the whole passage from the beginning to the expression he desired to recall.

Dr. Moffat, the distinguished African missionary, and the father-in-law of Dr. Livingstone, once preached a long sermon to a crowd of negroes. Shortly after he had finished he saw a number of negroes gathered about a simple-looking young savage. He went to them and discovered that the savage was preaching his sermon over again. Not only was he reproducing the precise words, but imitating the manner and gestures of the white preacher.

A LESSON FOR GIRLS.

The Folly of Advertising for Husbands Again Sadly Shown.

A prepossessing, well-dressed young woman stepped up to the Erie Telegraph Office yesterday afternoon and requested that the following telegram be sent:

To Mrs. Stark, No. 311 Wythe avenue, New York
Have been deserted. Please advise White to telegraph me $5 to get home.
KITTIE ROCKWELL.

She had made several attempts to borrow money, which awakened suspicion that all was not right. Before the telegram was sent, therefore, she was advised to report her case to the chief of police, upon which it was withdrawn. The appearance and evident distress of the young lady aroused the curiosity of a Republican reporter, and after some inquiry the following was learned: About a year ago Miss Rockwell put an advertisement in a paper asking for matrimonial correspondents with a view to matrimony. She received an answer from John H. Hopkins, of this city, and a regular correspondence was begun, which ended in an exchange of photographs and, a little later on, in a betrothal. An appointment was soon made for her to meet her fiancé in this city, and she arrived Saturday afternoon. While at her hotel she was informed by a dining-room girl that her lover was a married man, with a wife and four children already to provide for, who are now living somewhere in Pennsylvania. Upon meeting him she charged him with this, but he denied the girl's allegations, and to prove his sincerity and honesty of purpose, took her to a well known business man, who knew him well, and asked him to assure the woman that he was a single man. This the gentleman refused to do, stating that he would not be a party to a questionable transaction. He then informed the deluded young woman that her husband in prospect was a married man, and advised her to have nothing to do with him. They left the place together, and it was soon after this that she wished to send the telegram to friends in New York for means to return home. The woman's trunk is at the Erie baggage-room. It is directed to "Miss Kittie Rockwell, care of John H. Hopkins, Binghamton, N. Y." Mr. Hopkins was interviewed at a late hour last night and gave the following version of the affair: "I saw the advertisement in the New York World about a year ago for correspondence with a view to matrimony. I answered it; it resulted in an engagement and she has come to be married. I am a single man, and all statements to the contrary are false. If people had kept their noses out of my business it would have been all right. I'll make a woman of her yet." The woman is still in the city.—Binghamton Republican.

Blonde and Brunette.

So you want to know what I think is the difference between a blonde and a brunette? I do not regard it merely as a question of complexion, because that would be drawing the lines too closely. A blonde should have a fair skin, blue eyes and light hair. Her brows may be dark, and, of course, would be her eyelashes, but this is seldom happens when the eyes are blue. A brunette should have a clear olive skin, dark eyes, black hair and brows and lashes. The general woman is a good brunette—that is, she has brown hair which is neither very dark nor very light; she has blue eyes, a complexion that is not absolutely clear pink and white, and dark brows and lashes, usually very heavy. The special woman has the skin of a blonde, light hair, vergoing to the yellow, dark eyes and brows and lashes. A typical American woman has a fair skin that lacks color, dark gray or deep brown eyes, either looking absolutely black and hair that, while it is light, has not the slightest tint of yellow in it. The blonde cendree has the same dull skin, darkish eyes and hair that seems close akin to gray, and yet never becomes so. Somebody said that Mrs. Langtry was a blonde cendree. Now, this is perfect nonsense. Her hair is a warm brown, her eyes a very deep hazel, and her skin absolutely blonde, the warm blood underneath showing through the white skin. She is the opposite a blonde-brune. The blonde type predominates, but there is sufficient color in her hair and eyes to suggest the brunette. A perfect blonde is seldom a beautiful woman for many years. The pink and white skin becomes rather doughy with them; blue eyes will fade, and gray hairs, charming as they are among black, make yellow look very passee. The blonde has not always much staying power; she is apt to grow limp after a very little worry, and too often becomes fretful. Mankind ought to be thankful that there are so many bleached blondes, as they do not lose their energy as a natural born one would. Some of the prettiest women in the world are the Irish girls, with their deep blue eyes, very black hair, and wonderfully clear skin. French women are seldom beautiful—they realize they are going to be old some day and they cultivate the art of dressing and of being chic in word and manner. A perfect brunette is seldom seen in this country; the average one, as noted in the Russian baths, loses decidedly by contrasts with the blonde-brune. Her skin looks sallow and she is much apter to angles than to curves—a something not at all in the line of beauty.

Here's a word of advice to the blondes—If you want to keep your skin looking as if it were alive, take as much exercise as you can; drive, ride or walk, and don't be afraid occasionally to bathe your face in a strong mixture of gin and water. You will feel brighter and fresher, and really, my dear, one is cleaner after its use.

Long and Short Engagements.

Chicago Girl—You have been engaged three years? How primitive! Why, in Chicago long engagements are very unfashionable. Three years! Time thrown away.

Omaha Girl—Oh, a year or so more less doesn't matter here. When we get married we stay married.—Omaha World.

THE DEAD OR THE QUICK

A Complete Novel After the Style of Miss Amelie Rives.

CHAPTER I.

Miss Barbarity Espadon returned to her old Virginia home on a dark, tempestuous night which had been specially selected for her by the powers, so that she could drive through the howling rain and allow the ragged storm to match in her face as she came.

When she reached Rosemary her aunt rushed to meet her, kissed her, and then disappeared in the pantry.

Also there was a good looking young widow, who had come with Val, Valentine, three years before. She was now back at the home that she loved, and as soon as she recovered from the exhilarating effects of her aunt's kiss she was shown to her room. [illegible] Senator, and its familiar [illegible] into convulsions. Everybody [illegible] of Valentine. [illegible] Barbarity did not see Dock [illegible] became aroused, and after [illegible] look of her wrist, as was [illegible] she took a seat on a [illegible] mat.

[illegible] to Barbarity's conscience [illegible] she dismissed Dock, ran up to her room, and drowned her remorse by standing before her mirror, where she proceeded to address a few uncomplimentary remarks to the image therein. She [illegible] with horror that she [illegible] the fire in the grate.

Dock, the living, and Val., the dead, were now pronounced rivals for Barbarity's affections. It worried Dock a great deal, but Val. pursued the even tenor of his way and did not seem to mind it at all. Dock finally retreated to New York. There he received a letter from Barbarity, bidding him farewell forever. He accordingly lighted four gas burners in his room, took a Turkish bath and went to a comic opera.

CHAPTER IV.

Val. [illegible] telegraphed him "Come to me."

He packed his valise and went back to Virginia, where he was welcomed by Barbarity with all the fervor of a human Vesuvius. She sank into his arms.

A week of ecstasy followed. Dock and Barbarity were dreaming love's young dream. They were now on the brink of matrimony, but Dock's good fortune had not quite deserted him. One day a terrific storm of the author's best construction broke loose, and Barbarity was caught in it. She was terribly frightened by the thunder, and she discovered by the glare of the lightning that she couldn't marry Dock. When she got home she so informed him.

And he, after telling Barbarity that he had had his opinion of her all along, put his wearing apparel into a valise and went over to the nearest saloon. In the meantime Barbarity had gone up to her room, donned her wrapper, and was deeply absorbed in the last number of the New York Ledger.—Life.

John Wesley on the American Revolution.

A curious and characteristic letter of John Wesley, bearing date June 11th, 1775, has been discovered by the Historical Manuscript Commisson among the family papers of the Earl of Dartmouth. It is addressed to Lord Dartmouth, at that time Secretary of State for the Colonies, and is an energetic and passionate protest against the war in America. "All my prejudices," says the writer, "are against the Americans, for I am a High Churchman, the son of a High Churchman, bred up from my childhood in the highest notion of passive obedience and non-resistance. And yet, in spite of all my rooted prejudices, I cannot avoid thinking, if I think at all, that an oppressed people asked for nothing more than their legal rights, and that in the most modest and inoffensive manner which the nature of the case would allow. But waiving all considerations of right and wrong, is it common sense to use force toward the Americans? Remember Rehoboam, remember Philip II., remember Charles I."—St. James Gazette.

The W. C. T. U. in Japan.

In Tokio alone the members of the W. C. T. U. are over 300, and likewise good numbers will be found in Kobe, Osaka and Kioto. Japan especially is indebted to the W. C. T. U. of America for the temperance work. Japanese papers often speak with great appreciation of Miss Frances E. Willard. Her writings are constantly translated into Japanese papers. By these influences, temperance work is swiftly moving on towards victory. Japan hopes in future that she will produce a Miss Frances E. Willard.

Miss Amelie Rives, the authoress, is said to have been overwhelmed with offers of marriage since her portrait was published recently.

CHARLIE ROSS AGAIN.

Said to Be Living in New York State and Acknowledged by His Father.

L. G. Reno, a prosperous and intelligent farmer, living about one and one half miles from Cooperstown, in this State, says the Syracuse (N.Y.) Standard, was in Syracuse yesterday on business, and in the course of conversation with a friend the subject of the abduction of Charlie Ross was mentioned as an unexplained event.

"Unexplained!" repeated Mr. Reno quickly. "Why, I know Charlie Ross as well as I do my own brother. He has told me the story of his abduction fifty times. He lives right among us in Cooperstown, and everybody [illegible] there has no other thought than [illegible] he was the child abducted so strangely from his Philadelphia home fifteen [illegible] sixteen years ago. He worked for me on my farm two years ago from October to April. He has since worked in Cooperstown. He is now 19 or 20 years old, a fine-looking young man, bright and of fruitful resource. He is thought a great deal of by the people of the town. The story which I have heard so often from him, and confirmed in many details by others, is that a circus man and woman enticed him into their carriage as he [illegible] ing to buy [illegible] de way from [illegible] York and [illegible] taken to [illegible] ments performed [illegible] jump and [illegible] was brought to [illegible] about the [illegible] The circus [illegible] in one [illegible] where the [illegible] and treated [illegible] They used [illegible] of a straw mat on his back [illegible] cats. "The missionary [illegible] Charlie for a year or [illegible] then entrusted the boy to his father, Captain Kinney, the captain of a steamboat line running between Havana and New York city. Capt. Kinney took Lewis to the Cooper Orphanage at Cooperstown, an Episcopal institution, the matron of which was known and is now a daughter of J. Fenimore Cooper. The boy was then about 7 years old, I believe. Captain Kinney was deeply interested in the boy, and suspected that he was Charley Ross, the kidnapped matron. What bothered them was that he pronounced his name 'Russ,' using the Scottish accent. Of course he couldn't spell his name. Correspondence was entered into with Mr. Ross and photographs obtained of Mr. and Mrs. Ross. The boy was awakened in the middle of the night, shown one of the photographs, and asked if he knew who it was. He said it was his mother. He also identified the likeness of his father. Mr. and Mrs. Ross were then sent for and went to the orphanage. Mrs. Ross had been rendered insane by grief over the loss of her son, but seemed to have a brief interval. Twenty men were placed in a room and the boy was asked which was his father. He went right to him. He was then taken into a room where there were twenty-two women and he picked out his mother. Mr. Ross was then satisfied and prepared to take his child away. His trunk was packed and sent to the depot. Then Mrs. Ross suddenly burst forth in one of her raving spells, and insisted that the child be taken from her sight. The only way to quiet her was to leave the child behind. Mr. Ross, however, believed Charley to be his son, and often visited him, wrote him frequent letters and paid for his clothing for several years. But various distractions, including the insanity of his wife, have affected Mr. Ross, who seems to have lost all interest in his son. It has been nearly a year since he has written him a letter. About the time of the Centennial Exhibition Capt. Kinney took Charley to Philadelphia, and walked with him up the street where he was playing when abducted. The boy did not seem to recognize anything at first, but presently began to stoop and look around, and then said: 'That is the tree I was on when they took me away.' The matter was published in the Cooperstown papers at the time of these occurrences, but there were so many Charley Ross stories about that time that this story did not attract attention outside. None of Charley's relatives admit his identity except Mr. Ross himself. The young man is smart, and is bound to make his mark in the world."

The following gentlemen of Litchfield have just returned from there: John E. Stone, county surveyor; John A. Bishop, merchant; R. O. Willis, merchant; Judge T. B. McBeath, circuit judge. They fully corroborate all the details herein given, and pronounce it one of the greatest wonders the world ever saw. Bee Spring is fourteen miles from Litchfield and seventeen miles from Mammoth Cave. The country is wild and broken. It is full of caves and sink holes. The shock was so great that the town of Litchfield was shaken as if an earthquake had taken place. People ran from their houses in great alarm. The Episcopal Church, which was a fine brick structure, is a mass of ruins. Goods on the shelves in the stores were thrown violently on the floor, and houses rocked to and fro. Everybody thought it was a great earthquake until Meredith, who lives near Bee Spring, came dashing into town on a bareback mule, bringing the startling intelligence, which, with a despatch from Prof. Klein in answer to one sent him, explained the phenomenon to a great extent. Litchfield is a town of about 1,050 inhabitants, and the county seat of Grayson county.—Cleveland Leader.

Sedentary Habits.

In this age of push and worry, the business man and the professional man are alike unable to devote any adequate time to exercise. In the daily round of toil and pleasure, no suitable provision is made for that important function, and the result is that men of sedentary habits become subject to many forms of ailments arising from a torpid or sluggish liver. Constipation, sick headache, biliousness and dyspepsia are all due to the improper action of the liver. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets cure these troubles by restoring the liver to its normal condition.

The Pappoose, published at the Genoa Indian School, in Nebraska, makes the statement that Indians are becoming bald-headed as a result of the change from feathers to hats and caps.

A Graveyard Cough.

The short, dry, hacking cough, which announces the approach of consumption, has been aptly termed a graveyard cough. The peril is great, and near at hand, but it can be surely averted with Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, a botantic remedy, without a peer for pulmonary, throat and liver affections, and for all ailments which, like consumption, have a scrofulous origin, and also for eruptions and sores, indicating impurity of the blood. Druggists all sell it.

Seedless Raisins.

The seedless raisin is produced by simply arresting one of the processes of nature. When the grapes is about one-half ripe the end of the vine is bent down and buried in the ground. This prevents the formation of seed and the full development of the fruit, but it ripens all the same, and has delicious flavor.

Although it had travelled almost the entire length of his body it had caused him no pain or inconvenience.

"WIRE-PULLING."

Most people can recall the time when they first saw "Punch and Judy" and other comical figures operated on the street or public square; and will remember how heartily they laughed at the performance. Many juveniles have wondered how the wooden figures acted in such a life like manner, until told about the man concealed beneath or behind the drapery, who pulled certain wires or strings connected with the images. This was a very innocent pastime compared with the kind of wire-pulling to which we wish to direct attention.

Ambition is a grand quality in man, so long as it is confined within certain bounds. It tends to raise him above mediocrity socially, intellectually, morally; but unbridled ambition inevitably leads to disappointment and failure in the end—no matter how easy the way may appear in the first stages. The first seeks to attain to certain altitudes by sure and honorable methods; the latter tries to get there by the shortest route and in the quickest possible manner, however questionable the means employed.

In this connection our thoughts are led to dwell upon the "religious" wire-puller, whose wild ambition to mount the ladder of position, at whatever cost, furnishes food for sad reflection in these degenerate days. An instance came under our notice the other day. A minister of the Gospel, whose restless and uncurbed ambition and intense egotism have won for him a rather unenviable reputation, was the central figure. This gentleman—if we may dignify him by that title—became fired with a burning desire to shine as one of the "lights" in a certain conference stationing committee. To this end he made a personal canvas of every minister, except one, in his district unblushingly and boldly asking them to vote for him at the approaching District Meeting—in some cases offering bribes! How to capture the votes of the laymen was a question he did not hesitate to tackle with his customary audacity. He sent a postcard to each of the ministers—with the one exception noted—and coolly asked these brethren to influence their respective laymen in his behalf! You see he did not know the names of the gentlemen likely to be elected as lay representatives, or he would undoubtedly have approached them as he did his brethren of the cloth. He secured his election by a very narrow majority—but at what a cost! The French King, Francis I could exclaim with the true dignity of noble manhood "All is lost but honor!" but this wire-pulling preacher, with a string of high sounding handles to his name, could only say "All is gained but honor!" Let us add, that the brethren of the cloth, who responded to the invitation of the scheming wire-puller so heartily—induced to do so in some cases, no doubt, by promises of preferment—are just as much in the mud as the other is in the mire.

It is to be hoped that some effort will be made to stamp out this disgraceful wire-pulling and bribery; and that, in future, men will be elected to important positions more on their own merits and less on their superlative egotism and cheek.

The Blessings of Monarchy.

From the York Herald.

Sir,—By reason of magnificent widespread British monarchial rule for hundreds of years supported by costly powerfull armies and navies. Great Britain among first class nations has not only proudly and honorably held her own but acquired the most valuable colors in the world, wherein are settled thousands and millions of her happy people in peace, affluence and quite solid security from the encroachments of and outside enemy: had it been governed as a cheap Bradlaugh Republic all these brilliant advantages one after another would probably have been wrenched off—or slipped through our fingers for ever—such is the past and present aggressiveness and ambition of France, Russia, &c., for grabbing new territory. It may be said by opponents—look at the United States model Republic! how well it stands! They are—however—differently constituted States, whilst Britain is a few miles only from France and other great grabbing eagles. England as a Republic would become an easy prey, while the United States remoin invulnerable. In fact neither Russia nor France would hardly attempt the latter, trouble or permanently hold the U. S. A. Under these circumitances and, considering the millions of British subjects scattered through India, Australia, Canada, &c., assisted by our old John Bull Conservateve flag, it would appear that the time is not yet ripe for throwing overboard Monarchy when Her Majesty quits this earthly scene, and our trying on a red Republican, less costly form. Of course there is some little show of sound reason in these inciptent public expressions of complaint at the ever increasing cost of keeping up prolific Royal families, in splendor: evidently something must be enactep to reduce this big item, but how to do this decently, wisely and safely is a puzzle at present. Probably it will be deemed expedient for parliament to fix new limits so as to bring Monarchy more moderate and better acceptable to British people—leaving that notion of sudden change for Republicanism to rest quietly sine die, for there is every likelihood under tqe latter rule, absurd economy would be one of its main planks—army and navy cut down or abolished, and our valuable colonies be forced to provide themselves at enormous outlay with both inorder to prevent Russia or France laying siege to Australia, and Canada. In discussing these questions many persons altogether forgot the manifold blessings we and our relations all over the world enjoy under good Queen Victoria.

CREAMERY.

Mr. R. H. Cook's creamery here is now in full operation. THE ADVANCE man visited it on Saturday and found Mr. Cook and his assistant, Mr. Philips, busy at work manufacturing butter in a neat and well constructed building erected for the purpose. The churn, which is constructed on the most approved scientific principle, was being operated by horse power. THE ADVANCE man tested the first butter made in the creamery and unhesitatingly pronounces it a very superior article, and one that will command the top market price anywhere. Mr. Cook is deserving of great praise, as well as an extensive patronage, for his enterprise. Another season will find his creamery business vastly increased.

NEW POST OFFICE.

The Station Post Office has changed location and management. About two months ago it was removed to Mr. Wm. Hog's store and placed under the management of that gentleman by the Inspector.

C. P. R. STATION AND GROUNDS.

A handsome new station house will be erected here this summer by the C. P. R. Co. to replace the one destroyed by fire last winter. A portion of the hill on the west of the track will be cut down and dumped into the hollow on the east side. The new station building will be located across the track from where the old one formerly stood—adjoining the steam flour mill property. This will obviate the necessity for crossing the track in driving to the station from Flesherton and points east, which will be a decient improvement. It is also on dit, that another side track or two will be laid in order to facilitate the movements of freight trains. The present accommodation in the matter of side tracking is quite inadequate, as was clearly demonstrated by an instance which came under the personal notice of the writer last Saturday evening, when a lengthly freight train had to be separated and inconveniently located in various places in order to allow free passage for the south-bound passenger train. And even than the matter was managed with much difficulty the passenger train being delayed some ten or fifteen minutes, while the distribution of freiget cars was taking place.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

Mr. Johnston Little is booming business in the blacksmithing.....The hotel is being brick-clad under the efficient management of Mr. Fred Ryder. The carpenter work in connection with same building is being hustled in good shape under Mr. John Whitten's surveillance.

Priceville Pointers.

The Agricultural Editor again Heard From.

Once more on deck! And now for regular visits to Priceville—the nice little town located on the Western hills overlooking the Saugeen river, five miles from Flesherton and ten or eleven miles distant from Sleepy Hollow, otherwise yclept Durham.

A fine hale hearty old gentleman is Mr. John D. Simpson, who has been in the furniture business in Priceville for thirty years. Long life and prosperity to you, John!

It is expected that work on the new Presbyterian church will shortly be commenced. The necessary excavations have been made for the foundation walls, and large quantities of brick and stone are on the grounds ready to put in place by the masons. Judging from present indications, the building will be a capacious and handsome one.

Mr. Robert Oliver has probably the most extensive farm in South Grey. He has a farm of 760 acres in Artemesia, which is splendidly stocked. He has no less than 30 milch cows and all other kinds of stock in proportion. His success as an all-round farmer has very few parallels in the county.

An agitation is on foot here for establishing a two-mail-a-day system between this point and the C. P. R. depot, which would be a great convenience to business men and the public generally. Priceville really should have much better accommodation in this respect.

Mr. Jones, the new Tailor here, is becoming more popular every day and is working up a fine business.

Mr. Robert Watson has a very neat and well stocked harness shop. His business is rapidly increasing, and as friend Robert is immensely popular, we expect to see him prosper more and more as the years roll around.

Another improvement addition to Priceville's business enterprises is the new bakery under the careful and excellent management of Mr. Alf. Watson. The shop is a very neat one.

Business booming at Brander's as usual. Just consult our "Tit-Bits" column and see what Mr. Brander says there.

Alex. Brown, an old and respected resident of the village, has been quite ill lately, but is now becoming convalescent.

The Commercial Hotel has greatly improved its dining room accommodation since our last visit, and is otherwise a first-class hostlery.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.
DISEASES OF MAN.
M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,
THE GREAT HEALTH RESTORER,
Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.
Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN
Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.
SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feeling in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

A Man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. HEAL THE SICK.

A Permanent Cure. ✠ A Pleasant Cure.

No Universal Remedy

has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,

which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.

Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.

That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.

All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla,

CANADA'S NEW PARTY.

An Address to the People.

There are signs in the political sky which indicate that our country is on the eve of momentous changes. The influences which led to the federation of half-a-dozen widely scattered provinces more than twenty years ago, have well-nigh spent their force, and the necessity for some new and stronger bond of union has become apparent. That our present national status cannot long remain unchang'd is a foregone conclusion. Sectional interests are opposed to national unity. Antagonisms of race and creed are ominious of coming strife. Party feuds corrupt the electorate and divert attention from necessary legislation; and instead of patriotic endeavors to awaken national aspirations, and pave the way for national development, the energies of the people are wasted in party contests that are fruitful only of embittered feelings and mutual hate.

At such a time it becomes the duty of every patriotic citizen to think of his country; to investigate carefully the causes that have led to the present crisis, and to discover, if possible, some remedy for the dangers which threaten our national existence. That the provinces of the Dominion are held together by a very slender tie, admits of no dispute. With so brief a history they have no common traditions such as unite other nationalities; no community of interests which, in the absence of national sentiment, might hold them together for a time; and unless it be possible to awaken the aspirations of the people for a career of true national development, it is difficult to see that the future can have anything in store for the Dominion save disintegration, and then piecemeal absorption by a foreign power.

The gravity of the situation, in so far at least, as it affects existing parties, is felt by the political leaders, and they are casting about for some line of policy which, by diverting the attention of the people from real issues, may, for a while, put off the evil day. But it is high time for the people to consider if this young nation, with its splendid possibilities, is indeed shut up to lines of policy which, on the one hand, will doom us through all coming time to the leading-strings of political babyhood, or, on the other, will land us a long stage on the road toward annexation with a foreign power. It is the opinion of those who now address you that these are not the only alternatives. They think the solution of our national problems lies in the creation of a truly national spirit, and that this demands a policy in which the interests of our own country shall be the first and chief consideration; a policy that will not treat lightly the ties that bind us to the glorious Mother land, but which, at the same time, will encourage those national aspirations which will enable the Dominion to shape its own destinies, and to treat with other nations, on terms of equality, regarding its commercial interests and its international rights.

It cannot be denied that in attempting to develop a national spirit among the people of our scattered provinces, we must begin at the very foundation. Hitherto the trend of party politics has been in an opposite direction. There have been many appeals to prejudice, but none to patriotism. In the exegencies of party strife class has been set against class and creed against creed. Provincial interests, which should be identical with Dominion interests, are made to conflict, and the thought of the politicians is not how closely they can unite, but how widely they can diverge. To-day there is no question of principle dividing the existing parties, yet the bitterness of party rancor seems to have grown in inverse ratio to the importance of the interests at stake. These evils we believe to be legitimate fruits of the party system as at present administered, and it becomes the duty of honest men to find a remedy if they can. That remedy consists in setting Country above Party, and in substituting a reign of principles for a reign of corruption. To accomplish this, the Christian and moral sentiment of the country must come to the front. It must insist that party schemes shall be subordinated to national interests, and that the will of the people shall no longer be frustrated by the manipulators of the party "machines."

For such a movement the hour is propitious. All the signs of the times point to a speedy disintegration of the old parties, and the formation of new alliances around living issues; but whether this shall be a new departure upon a higher plane, or merely a fresh marshalling of obsolete questions under new names, and subject to the old corrupting influenes, the people alone can decide. Unless prompt steps are taken, the discredited partyism of the past will quickly reappear, not one whit kindlier, but only a little craftier than of yore. Do not misunderstand us. We bring no wholesale accusation against the men who compose the existing parties; our indictment is against the party system as at present administered. There are tens of thousands of "good men and true" ranged under the banners of their respective parties; but they are often compelled to stand aloof from the exercise of their votes to acts which they cannot justify.

A significant fact in connection with the existing parties is the absence of a definite policy. In this respect they occupy common ground. But men who love their country will never consent to have its destiny shaped by such loose and uncertain methods. They justly demand from their political leaders a distinct announcement of the policy they intend to pursue, and the principles upon which the government of the country shall be conducted. If those who assume to be leaders cannot or will not do this, they are not entitled to the confidence of honest men, and as they have failed thus far to meet this reasonable requirement, they cannot complain if others take up the neglected task. A policy that will please everybody is not to be expected; but we are persuaded that an honest platform, framed in the interests of the whole country, would quickly unite the best men of existing parties, and rally a strength of sentiment and conviction that will tell with controlling effect upon the legislation of the future.

Such a Platform we venture to submit. Doubtless it will be objected to by partisans on both sides—that is to be expected; but we are not without hope that it will commend itself to reasonable men of all parties, especially to those who believe in truth and righteousness, and who hold that these should be controling factors in public affairs. We believe, also, that the young men of our country, who are beginning to exercise their rights as citizens and have not yet abandoned themselves to the tyranny of party, will gladly come upon a platform where they can stand without any compromise of moral principle, or any sacrifice of their manhood or of their personal rights. A casual glance will show that the foundation principles of the Platform now submitted are completely at variance with the actual if not avowed policy of existing parties, and that the general adoption of these principles would produce an entire revolution of political methods and aims. This is precisely what we seek to accomplish, and we are convinced that by uniting the Christian and moral sentiment of the country on the lines proposed, it can be done.

In framing the platform which is now submitted the two objects were kept in view: First, to group [illegible] the new party on principles that would allow no truckling or [illegible] cooked methods or subterfuges; and, second, to deal only with those specific questions which most directly touch the welfare of the people at the present time. It is for this reason that the Prohibition of the liquor traffic holds a foremost place. Other questions will arise from time to time, and can be dealt with on their merits, but if the reforms demanded by this Platform can be accomplished, the country can well afford to wait awhile for the settlement of less important issues.

In this connection, attention is called to the present attitude of the existing parties in regard to temperance legislation. During the present session of the Dominion Parliament a Bill to amend the Scott Act was introduced by Mr. Jamieson, a supporter of the Government, but its consideration was repeatedly postponed. When a motion was before the House to go into Committee of Supply, the Hon. Mr. Mills, a member of the Opposition, submitted an amendment to the effect that Mr. Jamieson's Bill ought to be a Government measure, and that the Government ought to provide the machinery for Scott Act enforcement. This amendment, being regarded as a mere party manœuvre, was met by a strait party vote, and defeated by a large majority. The point to be noted is, that as Mr. Jamieson and Mr. Mills are both private members, their action has no real significance touching the policy of their respective parties. That the Conservative party is opposed to Prohibition is well understood, and as the declaration made by the Liberal ex-leader, on the eve of the last election, that the Liberal party was not prepared to make Prohibition a plank in its platform, has never been modified or withdrawn, and as the present leader has steadily voted against prohibitory legislation, we are justified in assuming that the attitude of the Liberal party is still hostile to immediate Prohibition. At the same time, it is well known that there are large numbers in both parties whose voices and votes would be for Prohibition if they were not kept silent by party considerations, and we are convinced that the only way in which the convictions of such men can find expression is by the organization of a new political party, with Prohibition as its avowed policy.

In the carrying out of this project, an opportunity is afforded to all who are willing to put Country before Party, to unite in an honest endeavor to purify the political atmosphere, to secure the enactment of needed reforms, to educate public sentiment along the lines of patriotism and political honesty, and to give a new and better direction to the currents of political life. We aim at no selfish ends. Neither offices nor emoluments are sought or desired. To those who unite with us we can offer no rewards that appeal to cupidity or selfish ambition. We offer only the opportunity—enough, surely, to stir the heart of every true patriot!—of working to good purpose for the best interests of home and country, and of finding richest reward in something accomplished for the benefit of the land we love. That our aims will be deemed Utopian by those who regard the electorate as so many cattle to be bought and sold, is quite likely; but we are unwilling to believe that truth and honor and patriotism are mere forms of speech, or that the disreputable partyism of the past has so succeeded in corrupting the whole body politic as to render political reform an impossibility. The ends we seek cannot be accomplished in a day. Many a battle must first be fought. Courage and patience will be needed, and for a time we may be a minority, but what of that?

"If God be God, if truth be truth,
If Christian men be men,
Let them arise and fight the fight,
Though it were one to ten!"

And when victory crowns our efforts, it will be but another illustration of the truth that it has often pleased God to redress wrongs and uplift the world by the agency of consecrated and clean minorities.

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.,

Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:

My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.

Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,

C. EDWARDS LESTER.

A Natural Inference.

One dark and chilly winter night,
(All dimly burned the nursery light,)
There came from out the farthest bed,
Where lay a towsled, curly head
A wheezing, barking, croupy sound,
That waked the mother with one bound.

With turpentine and ipecac,
With mutterings front and rubbings back,
With many a blister, many a spell,
The croupy little man pulled through,
[illegible] much less gayly,
[illegible] that night smelt away.

[illegible] not so very long
[illegible] beginning of his song,
[illegible] lament fell on the ear,
[illegible] poems "grand" and "square"
[illegible] the hero shed a tear about
[illegible] had not come out.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

"Yes—my heart such a weary pain, Lucie! Nay, do not look so troubled, dear; it will be better soon. It is not much; but I have always been a coward at bearing pain."

Her head fell back wearily upon the cushions and she closed her eyes, laying her hand in Lucie's as she knelt beside her, while Miss Grey, looking at the wan death like face framed in falling hair, thought that any more grief must kill her. And yet how could they spare her this grief, which might, which would, Lucie feared, come within the hour? They had been careful to let none of the rumors which had been rife in the little town reach her; even Lady Eastwell had been carefully kept away for it was she who, in her violent hysterical passion of grief, had cried out that the dead man had been murdered, and that Guy Stuart had murdered him and there were hundreds who share Her belief; and, little as Lucie Grey knew of Shirley's story, she felt instinctively that such a report would be to her more bitter than death itself. She remembered the look which had come into Shirley's eyes when he had joined them so unexpectedly among the rocks; she remembered how the lovely face had brightened and flushed and lost all its weariness; and, as she thought of Guy's grave noble face, she felt that the accusation was as false as it was monstrous.

And yet the proofs were dreadfully against him. They had set out together on the morning of Sir Hugh's last day on earth, and beside the body had been found, stained and discolored with blood, the silver headed bamboo cane, the weapon which it was quite evident had given the blow on the head which had been the immediate cause of death. True the face had but all its semblance of humanity when the body was found, but the huge boulder of rock under which it had been partly concealed had evidently tilted over and fallen upon it, crushing the handsome face which had looked back so smilingly at Shirley a few short hours before, while, as if to let justice have every chance in its favor, the back of the head remained untouched, although the fair hair was matted and stained with blood. What a terrible end to the brilliant career!

"What are you thinking of, Lucie?" asked Shirley, lifting the heavy lids languidly. "How sorrowful you look, dear! I seem to bring sorrow and pain to all who love me."

"I would suffer infinitely more pain to possess your friendship, Shirley," Miss Grey said, in her soft sincere voice; and the faintest little wraith of a smile flitted over the white lips.

"Thank you, dear. Oh, Lucie, what should I have done without you? Even Ruby could not have been a truer friend than you. Dear Ruby, she must not know," she added earnestly. "All her happiness at the birth of her little daughter would be destroyed. Lucie, how slowly the time goes! I wonder why they are so long?"

She moved restlessly on the cushions and with a weary impatient gesture pushed back her hair from her forehead.

"Poor darling, it is wearisome for you lying there!" Lucie said, putting her cool hand upon the throbbing temples.

"What makes them so long, Lucie?"

The sweet eyes, so sad and pleading, made Lucie's lip quiver; she felt sure that it was doubt as to the verdict they should return which had detained the jury.

"I cannot say, dear," she whispered tremulously; and there was a long silence.

"Lucie, how weary you must be, and how selfish I am!" said Shirley then. "Ring for some tea, dear; you have been here so many hours."

Lucie rang, not for the tea only, but for a chance of speaking to some one who could tell her something of what was going on in the large dining-room below. When the servant answered the bell, Shirley had relapsed into her old apathy, and lay back with closed eyes, so that Lucie had an opportunity of speaking a few words to the girl and having her suspicions confirmed.

"Oh, how will she bear it?" Lucie said to herself, great tears filling her eyes at the thought. "Oh, if the mother had only been well enough to come to her! I am afraid it will kill her!"

"Lucie"—the shrill agonized tones startled her, the wild haggard eyes were wide and horror-stricken—"don't let me go to sleep. I was dozing, I suppose—oh, such a horrid dream!"

She clung with both hands to Lucie, who bent over her anxiously, and, so clinging, raised herself and stood upon her feet, trembling in every limb, with a cold dew starting on her forehead.

"Don't let me lie there—don't let me sleep, Lucie. I will sit up. Give me some air: I am choking; I cannot breathe."

Lucie hastily pushed open the window, letting the air play upon the white pinched face which lay upon her shoulder so heavily, while it required all her strength to prevent the nerveless limbs from slipping to the ground.

Below, groups of people were collected, talking eagerly among themselves; and one or two glanced up at the window, but saw nothing to attract attention.

"What a murmur of voices!" Shirley's faint voice said. "Is there a crowd? My eyes are so dim, I cannot see. There are people there, are there not?"

"Yes, dear. Are you better? Let me close the window."

"Why are the people there? Why are they waiting? Why don't they go? Lucie, help me—I cannot stand."

She was not insensible or unconscious, but the same terrible weakness was creeping over her again, and but for the opportune assistance of the servant who at that moment brought in tea, she must have fallen to the ground. With the girl's help, she was placed in an arm-chair, and Lucie made her drink a little wine.

"It is absurd to be so weak," she murmured, when they were alone again. "I am worse even than Mrs. Beaudesert was on the night of the storm" with a faint smile—"and I felt so impatient with her. But she fainted, you know, and lost all consciousness. Ah, if I only could! Lucie, I think death must be like this. Don't cry, dear," she added, as Lucie fairly broke down. "I promised I would—. Ah, there is some one!"

The door opened softly, and Mrs. Beaudesert entered, looking pale and subdued and tearful. She had not seen Shirley since the night of the storm, and now she uttered a startled, shocked exclamation.

"Dead over!" The voice was almost inaudible from agitation and weakness.

"No, not yet," Mrs. Beaudesert said unsteadily; "but it cannot be long now. Poor Shirley! Do not be afraid. It cannot go against him."

"What cannot go against him?"

"The the verdict," Mrs. Beaudesert said, startled by a sudden imperative gesture from Lucie which she was inclined to resent.

"Shirley, will you go back to the sofa?" asked Miss Grey, speaking fast and excitedly in her terror. "You will rest better there. Mrs. Beaudesert will help you."

"Lucie, are you hiding anything from me?" Oh, how pitiful the look in the sweet eyes was! "What does she mean? A verdict! I thought it was only a trial for for" her voice died away on a gasp, but she forced herself to continue "for murder that there was."

"My darling, the coroner's decision is all" "called a verdict," said Lucie earnestly. "Are you feeling faint again, Shirley?"

"No, no, no! I am well," she answered eagerly. "Mrs. Beaudesert, my heart! What what is that What what is that?"

There was a sound of voices and footsteps, of opening and shutting doors; they could hear the shouting of the crowd outside. Mrs. Beaudesert flushed and trembled and ran to the door, Lucie Grey turned pale, and Shirley stood up, supporting herself by both hands upon her chair, waiting with [illegible] which was [illegible] itself, it must [illegible].

It was broken [illegible] hurrying footsteps along the passage the rustle of heavy silken skirts, the tapping of high heeled shoes, and Lady Eastwell [illegible] into the room, her handsome face [illegible] eager and triumphant, [illegible] toward her, standing before [illegible] seeing her movement, [illegible] went to her side.

"What [illegible] Shirley said. "[illegible] look as if you had good news, Alice."

"So I have," she answered, with a [illegible] defiance in her [illegible] voice. "The [illegible] object in what I have long [illegible] prayed for from the beginning. [illegible] think such wicked men will not be punished? Oh, you may look shocked, Lena, and try to silence me; but there would be no justice on earth if such a wretch should not meet with his deserts!"

"Alice, you are cruel; for pity's sake come away! She is so ill," entreated Mrs. Beaudesert, her bright eyes full of fear. "It will kill her," she whispered.

Oh, come away, come away! Do not be the first to tell such an awful thing." She had clasped her little hands over Lady Eastwell's arm, and was trying to draw her out of the room, but Alice resisted, the evil vindictive look deepening in her eyes.

"Don't be absurd, Lena! She must know it some time or other, and she may as well hear it from me," she said, angrily. "Take away your hands; you are hurting me." She pushed up the sleeve of her dress, looking with an angry color in her cheeks at the red marks of the widow's eager hands on the white flesh. "See how rough you are!" she continued. "What absurd nonsense! As if I would not tell it to her more kindly than any one; for she must know it sooner or later."

"Lady Eastwell, let me entreat you," Lucie said imploringly; "say nothing now—she can bear no more! Oh, this is terrible!"

For Shirley was looking from one to the other, making desperate but ineffectual efforts to speak, while the parched white lips refused to obey her.

Lady Eastwell looked at Miss Grey in silent contemptuous disapproval, and made a step or two toward Shirley; but again Lucie interposed.

"My dear, my dear," she entreated, "come away, come with me to your room! I will help you. Do not stay here. Good Heaven, she is dying!" she added, in an agony, as Shirley's head sunk and her eyes closed; and Mrs. Beaudesert flew to the table for some wine, which she forced through the pale lips, in her agitation spilling a great part of it over the white wrapper that Shirley wore, while Lucie trembled so exceedingly that she could hardly support the failing limbs.

"Tell me," the poor girl said, when she could speak—"tell me; I can bear——"

"Another time," Lucie interrupted, tremulously. "It is nothing, dear; but you are fit for no more agitation now. Come with me and rest, and I will tell you." Gently but firmly Shirley put her aside.

"I must hear at once," she said. "Tell me, Alice."

Lady Eastwell hesitated now; she had been extremely startled by the mortal anguish on Shirley's face, and, rejoicing in her triumph as she was, she was afraid to tell her the news.

"Tell me, Alice."

"Well, the fact is, Shirley, that poor dear Hugh did not meet with an accident at all."

"No?"

The voice was calm and steady; it deceived Alice, but it did not deceive Lucie Grey; and she covered her face with her hands.

"No, he was murdered."

"Who—say—" The steady voice failed; but Alice answered the unfinished question:

"The jury. They have given a verdict of wilful murder against Guy Stuart."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Never for many a long year, never even in the memory of its oldest inhabitant, had the little country town of Exminster seen such a concourse of people in its streets as on the fair autumn morning when Guy Stuart was to be tried for his life, charged with the murder of the man who had been his friend and benefactor, the man whom he had loved and who had injured him so cruelly. It was not merely the pageant of the sheriff's procession which attracted such numbers; intense interest seemed to pervade all ranks of society as to the result of the trial which was to take place, and which must, be initiated as it, prove of special and thrilling import to all.

Nor was it the town-people of Exminster only who showed this interest. From far and near over the whole land came eager interested [illegible] of high rank and position, friends [illegible] of Sir Hugh Glynn's who had admired the brilliant, hapless baronet who had been carried home through the storm, cold and [illegible] with the red rose over which they had [illegible] a few short hours before still in the button-hole of his gray tweed coat; friends of Guy Stuart, brother officers who knew him well, and who were furious at the charge brought against one whom they liked, and of whose bravery and honor they had been justly proud during the time he had been one of them; friends of Lord and Lady Eastwell, guests at the house they had taken for a short time in the immediate neighborhood and those, taking their opinions from Alice, inveighed bitterly against the accused and the baseness of his crime. There were many too at Exminster who had known Lena Shirley in her brilliant career as belle and queen of society; and these were anxious to see how she bore herself now that she was dethroned, that her wealth was [illegible], for, by a will made a few weeks after her marriage, Sir Hugh's entire possessions had been left away from his wife, save a small annuity. Among the crowds of titled visitors who came by every train on the day before the trial, but few sympathised with Shirley. Women who had flirted with her husband in his bachelor days, men who had admired Shirley and feebly repelled by her haughty manner, were equally bitter against her now. If it was Guy who had committed the murder she was the cause of it, she had always hated her husband; she had married him doubtless through ambition, but she had loved Guy Stuart with a great love; and Lady Eastwell was looked upon as an oracle by the Machiavellian statesmen of fashion, who had agreed with her in her attribute to the poor girl whose one sin against Alice had been an involuntary one, whose only real cause for hatred lay in that fatal beauty which had won love she had not craved.

Lady Eastwell's denunciation of Guy Stuart and Shirley Glynn was bitter and vindictive to a degree which was terrible to contemplate—even Major Stuart's guilt could not have gratified it. She never spoke of the matter with out a calm, cold bitterness which startled her husband and caused her friends to say among themselves that her ladyship would make a bitter enemy. It was solely by her means that the reports of Guy's reason for hating Sir Hugh Glynn got abroad and were circulated far and wide, the threats he had uttered long before him, repeated to one and all; and it was in vain that Oswald Fairholme, terribly distressed, not only on poor Shirley's account, but because of the effect these rumors had in influencing public and private opinion against Guy, remonstrated earnestly and seriously with his sister as I entreated her to desist and let her enemy rest in this time of terrible distress. Alice listened to the remonstrances in sullen silence, and answered them on one occasion by an hysterical attack which entirely routed her brother, who was glad to escape and leave her to the ministrations of her long-suffering maid.

Oswald had come down immediately on hearing of Guy's arrest, leaving Ruby at Fairholme Court, where her little daughter had been born; and, although he had made every effort in Guy's behalf, he had found it quite impossible to get bail accepted. Already Lady Eastwell's immense influence had so much weight, and Guy had spent all the long summer days in prison, shut out from the warmth and beauty and sunshine.

That he had borne his captivity bravely and patiently Oswald knew; and he had won the esteem and regard of the officials, from the Governor himself down to the humblest warder. He was sanguine and cheerful as to the results of the trial; but the close imprisonment was telling on his health, and he was looking worn and haggard and ill.

It was well known that the ablest lawyers had been retained for the defence, that the great Q.C., Edwards Montagu, had arrived by the night-mail; and Major Stuart's friend and solicitor, Mr. Harcourt, of the firm of Harcourt & Clarendon, of Lincoln's Inn, had little doubt as to the result of the trial. Still, confidently as he spoke, there was a great anxiety in his eyes which belied the calm professional smile upon his lips as he entered the crowded court-house and glanced over the sea of living faces.

The court-house had been full many a time before, but never had it contained such a number of distinguished visitors. The entire gallery was thronged with ladies in rich somber mourning attire, silk and velvet and jet. Lord and Lady Eastwell and a few distinguished guests occupied seats near the bench, while Oswald, from his seat near Mr. Harcourt, glanced up once or twice anxiously to a slight dark-robed figure which sat in as retired a part as was consistent with a good view of the Judge and prisoner; and beside the sable-clad figure were Lucie Grey and her father, Shirley's slim deathly cold hand being held in Lucie's tender clasp.

Lucie and Mr. Grey had come to Exminster on the previous day with Shirley, who had spent the intervening weeks at the Vicarage, and they were staying at the cottage of one of the Vicarage servants who had married and settled at Exminster. Her house would be quieter and more private for Shirley than an hotel, Mr. Grey had decided; and Ada had accompanied her sister. Shirley was stronger now, but she was still very delicate, and it was doubtful whether she would ever regain her former health. For three weeks she had lain between life and death in the spare room at the Vicarage, and it was only her youth and naturally good constitution and the tender devoted nursing which had won her back to life and suffering; for, although she struggled bravely against her sorrow and forced a smile to her lips, she suffered a life-time of agony during those weeks which intervened between Guy's arrest and the trial. It seemed to her ever beyond all words that Guy, who had forgiven so nobly and pleaded with her so earnestly in behalf of the husband she had despised and hated, should be accused of so base and terrible a crime; and the thought that she would have to bear witness against the man she loved, accused of the murder of her husband, seemed to stupify her and numb every thought and feeling into one ceaseless pain.

They had entered the court early—for Mr. Grey had been anxious to save Shirley as much as possible from the curious glances and observations of the crowd—and few guessed that the closely veiled woman sitting so quietly was the widow of the dead man about whom so much had been said and thought and hinted during the long summer days.

The lawyers were in their places, the judge and sheriffs in theirs, and there was a momentary pause ere the prisoner was brought in. Mr. Montagu, however, with face impassive as usual, [illegible] round the court with [illegible] rimmed eyeglasses, but his eyes [illegible] for the sixtieth part of a minute on Lady Eastwell's handsome eager face, looked away across the court again, said something with a little smile to the Junior beside him, and then sat down [illegible] as the accused was brought into the court and stood by an iron grate, with the proud, erect look in the dear gray eyes which Shirley had known and loved so well.

He was looking somewhat worn and pale, but there was no other trace of emotion about him as he bowed courteously and took his place; and the noble face, so true and earnest, made public opinion veer around in his favor. Surely such a man could not be a murderer! If he had caused Sir Hugh's death, it had been done in fair fight. He was no coward, no traitor.

Watching him intently and curiously, with eyes that saw his every movement, the eager audience noticed that, after one swift searching glance around, he sat, with downcast eyes and folded arms, grave, attentive and proud, with no bravado or indifference, but equally without fear or nervousness, waiting.

The indictment was read. Ah, how every word pierced Shirley's heart! She had lifted her veil now, and sat with her eyes fixed upon Guy, whose profile she could partly distinguish, but, when Guy in a grave, deep, musical voice answered steadily "Not guilty," she dropped her veil and sank back, shrinking as if all eyes were upon her.

Then the lawyer for the prosecution commenced his speech, and Shirley heard, with a faint sickening feeling of horror and anguish, the whole story of her marriage laid before the public in polished eloquent words. They were told how Miss Ross had been betrothed to the prisoner at the bar; how the deceased had loved her with an overwhelming passion which had let no obstacle hinder its course; how he had [illegible] her to a Scotch irregular marriage [illegible] was from various circumstances concealed until the very day when she was to become the wife of the prisoner. The lawyer drew a vivid and impressive picture of the trembling bride, the irate bridegroom, the [illegible] claiming his rights and insisting on the possession of the wife which the Scotch marriage-laws had given him. He described the furious resentment natural even in just resentment of the man who had been betrayed, how he had sworn vengeance against the man who had stolen from him the woman he loved, a woman whose wondrous beauty had dazzled an honorable man to a degree which prevented his distinguishing right from wrong. The act of the deceased with regard to his marriage with Miss Ross was not one that would bear palliation or excuse; it was one which he had sorely repented when in possession of his saner judgment, one which perhaps he would have undone had it been possible.

"A married life begun in such circumstances was not likely to be a happy one," pursued the prosecuting counsel. "Sir Hugh and Lady Glynn lived in outward concord, but their private life was by no means so amicable. That she resented, and bitterly, the deception he had practised upon her is certain; but her conduct was exemplary until, after nearly four years' absence, the prisoner returned from Africa and they met once more the woman who loved, and the man who loved her, with only one life between them and happiness. You will see, gentlemen of the jury, by the evidence laid before you, that scenes full of passionate grief and sorrow occurred between them; that on one occasion a lady, calling upon Lady Glynn and about to enter her drawing-room unannounced, heard wild words expressive of hatred uttered by her, and not expressive of hatred only, but of a wish that her husband was dead. Terrible words for a man to hear who was already half maddened by the remembrance of his own wrongs, and who would inevitably suffer agony on seeing the anguish of the woman he loved! Shortly after this Lady Glynn's health failed, and the deceased, always a most tender and devoted husband, took her to Easton for the benefit of the sea-breezes, and they were accompanied by a select party of friends. One day the prisoner appeared in the neighborhood and spent the night with his friends and acquaintances, leaving the next morning for Lynmouth in company with the deceased. It was on the eleventh of July, gentlemen of the jury, a day to be remembered as one on which a terrible and almost unparalleled storm raged on our southern coasts and did serious damage on sea and land. When Sir Hugh, who was expected to return early in the afternoon, did not appear, it was supposed that he had taken shelter somewhere on his way. But, when the storm was at its height, the Vicar of Easton was summoned to two of his parishioners, sturdy fishermen, who, returning home under the shadow of the cliffs, had found the body of a man, quite dead, and so disfigured that it was impossible at first to recognize it. Past midnight though it was, the clergyman at once accompanied them to the inn where Sir Hugh Glynn and his party had taken up their quarters and there the hapless man was recognized by his clothes, by the ring on his finger, and by the rose on his breast which he had received from his wife's fingers, the same morning. At first it was supposed that he had met his death by an accident; but medical science proved beyond doubt that he had been killed instantaneously by a blow on the back of the head inflicted by some blunt instrument."

All this and much more the able counsel brought forward—that the prisoner whom the Crown had charged him to prosecute; and Shirley listened with a sickening horror creeping over her like an icy chill.

Several times Lucie looked at her anxiously, fearing she hardly knew what from the strained anguish depicted on the lovely face, lovely even now in its pallor and misery; but, whenever she met the tender anxious eyes, Shirley gave a little reassuring pressure to the fingers which were clasping hers and made a pitiful attempt to smile.

The counsel for the prosecution ended amid a general silence. His speech had been able and eloquent, but toward the end he faltered a little; it had seemed so impossible, looking at the prisoner's grave noble face, to believe him guilty of such a crime. As the lawyer sat down there was a perceptible expression of relief on his face, while a significant murmur ran through the court; and Lady Eastwell's eyes brightened as she saw how the eloquence and the proof he had brought forward were telling against Guy with the spectators.

Then the witnesses were called—the fishermen who had found the body, and one or two of the servants, whose evidence was unimportant but necessary; and those were followed by the doctors who had made the post-mortem examination. Their examination was lengthy and searching by counsel on both sides, but their testimony was the same—death had been caused instantaneously by the blow upon the back of the head; the injuries to the face had had nothing to do with it, they had been received after death.

"Could the blow have been struck by the prisoner?" asked the prosecuting counsel, pointing to the massive silver-topped cane which lay on the table, and which was the property of the prisoner.

"Yes."

"Are you convinced that the blow was so dealt?"

"Yes."

"You have seen [illegible] which was found upon the [illegible]."

"Yes."

"And you found it to contain what?"

"A few fair hairs from the head of deceased."

"That will do; you may stand down, Doctor Thorpe."

The next witness called was Lady Eastwell; and, as she left her place, proud and stately in her rich black satin robes, the spectators looked at her eagerly, the fair handsome woman with the vindictive light in her blue eyes.

The barristers glanced at her, and then at each other, as she stood quietly in the witness box; and when the accused spoke to her there was a slight shade of deference in his manner, due not so much to her position as to her beauty.

"You have known the accused some years, I believe?"

"Yes."

"You know him well—intimately?"

"Yes, at one time."

"When was that?"

"When he was staying at my father's, [illegible] marriage."

"[illegible] is your cousin?"

"Yes [illegible] she lived with us after her mother's death."

"She was [illegible] to [illegible]"

"Yes."

"But the engagement was [illegible] off?"

"Not at all," Lady Eastwell answered; "she continued the [illegible] for some time after her marriage to Sir Hugh."

"But she did [illegible] now of the marriage?"

"She said not."

The tone was significant; a faint smile stole over the lawyers' faces, and Mr. Montagu coolly put up his gold-rimmed eyeglasses, and looked at the witness steadily until the end of her examination.

A Chinese "She."

From an advertisement in the North China Herald, describing how the receipt for the "Fairy Life Pills" was obtained, it would appear that Rider Haggard's "She" once lived in China. "Ch'en-ta-jen was journeying on the Ch'ing-ch'eng hill when he saw a woman passing southward over the mountain tops as though flying. Her age was about 30, and in her hand was a stick, and she was pursuing an old man of about 100 years. Ch'en-ta-jen asked the woman, 'Why do you beat that old man?' She answered, 'He is my grandson, for I am 500 years old and he 111. He will not purify himself or take his medicine, so I am beating him.' The traveller alighted from his horse, knelt down and did obeisance to her, saying, 'Give me, I pray, this drug that I may hand it down to posterity for the salvation to mankind.' Hence its name."

Ornamental Plumbing.

The latest fad in plumbing is to leave all the pipes in a house open to the view. The pipes are, as a rule, the same as they used to be when they were inclosed, except that they are made of polished brass, or are nickel plated. For some reason, known only to fashion, it is presumed to be very reassuring as well as healthful for cranks, and others interested in sewer gas, to be able to see the pipes they are so much in awe of.—New York Sun.

Gilbert's protege, Julia, shortly gives a matinee of "Pygmalion and Galatea" at the Savoy, the lady appearing as the statue. For Mrs. Saker's benefit at Liverpool recently Neilson essayed the role to the great regret of the audience. She may fare better in London. Gilbert seems determined to push her before the public, who so far have not taken kindly to her.

'Tis the hand that rocks the cradle
Reaching out to save the world,
Flinging to the breeze the banner

Aye and mother wit that sternly
Puts the nation's sin away.

The Burden of Ancestry.

Some times I think it would have been better for all hands if we had never had any ancestors nor any precedents prior to the year 1789. Of what consequence were the old Dutch ancestors of New York compared to DeWitt Clinton, who laid out the Erie Canal and pressed its execution upon a comparatively poor commonwealth? Of what consequence were the so-called Pilgrim Fathers of New York compared to the men who started the Croton aqueduct, without which this island could never have grown to the population it has? How much more we owe to the first founders of our great public cemeteries than to the founders of the little churchyards which would otherwise have been, as in London, overpacked at the present day with superabundant dead? Sometimes I think we will owe quite as much to that generation or leader who will wipe the cemeteries out, and turn their monuments and headstones into some useful architecture for the living. To put the old mould of a discharged man under a $50,000 monument is as near idolatry, as the Greeks and Romans ever got, and I have never heard of but two cases where a useful man slipped into a rich man's tomb by way of charity, the first being in the case of Joseph of Arimathea, and the next that of Robert Fulton, who was slipped in the Livingston tomb, but he was a connection of that eminent family. If you notice our youngest American States, they get along much smoother than our oldest States. See how our Kansas is growing, without any forefathers, and see how South Carolina is groaning under its old planter oligarchy? See how readily Minnesota reaches out her antennæ to the Sault St. Marie, to Duluth, to Manitoba, to Dakota and to everywhere, having, it is said, five railroads to Chicago, whereas the building of the Boston & Albany Railroad and the consolidating of the Pennsylvania and New York Central lines were done as if nothing of that kind had ever been done before or could be done again. Why is it that Boston and New York are connected by a single corporation, when Buffalo and New York are connected by half a dozen corporations? Precedent is upon the head of the living age. The grave stone is not put upon the dead only, but upon the living.—George Alfred Townsend in Boston Globe.

Cuba's Two Meals a Day.

Only two meals a day are served in Cuban hotels. They live much as people do in some parts of France and Switzerland. You take an orange or two with a cup of coffee and a roll in the early morning; a liberal breakfast, in courses, is served at 11 o'clock and a ceremonious dinner at 4 or 5 in the afternoon. This mode of living is admirably suited to the climate, and you fall in with the custom and like it at once. The breakfast opens with small olives and fresh radishes served in the same dish; the next course is fish, then eggs, meat, etc. You are not asked what you prefer, but each course is set before you and you partake of it or not. Instead of beginning with fruit, the Cuban breakfast ends with it—pineapples cut from the stalks the same morning, bananas freshly picked, sapodillas, a faint and rather over sweet morsel, with oranges ad libitum. In Florida, and in many other parts of the country, the orange is cut in halves and its juice and pulp are passed to the mouth with a teaspoon. In Havana the orange is served whole on the table, peeled down to the juicy "meat of the fruit," and you present the golden ball to your lips on the prongs of a fork. At any and every American hotel the moment you sit down the question is almost flung at you, "Tea or coffee?" Cubans better understand what is healthful. They follow nature's plan and take their meals more as the lower animals do. Cubans do not fill up their stomachs with fluids during meals. After breakfast is over then coffee or tea is served—coffee in French style, at least one-half the cup being filled with milk.

WRITING NONSENSE

How Charles Dickens and Some Others Have Succeeded in Doing It.

Charles Dickens did many good things, but he committed one terrible and unpardonable crime. He published, in 1864, a delightful book, which he was wicked enough to call "Our Mutual Friend." The result is that ever since that day the word "mutual" has been systematically misused by the illiterate. Dickens ought to have called his book "Our Common Friend," which would have been sense; he called it "Our Mutual Friend," which is nonsense. For how can a friend be mutual? I know perfectly well that Pope also wrongly employs the word, but two wrongs do not make a right; and the meaning of "mutual" is notorious among all who are acquainted with its etymology. The meaning is "reciprocal" or "reciprocated," or "unexchanged." How does "Our Reciprocated Friend" sound? It is, I believe, entirely because Dickens perpetrated this enormity that we now hear such expressions as "mutual silence" or "mutual cousins" or "our mutual queen." The error is an easy one for the unlearned to stumble into; but when committed by a literary man is not to be excused. "Preposterous" is another word that is commonly maltreated. "The demands of Russia," wrote a great English diplomatist years ago, "are preposterous." I know, of course, what the diplomatist meant. He desired to say that the demands were such as his Government could not possibly concede; and to this day I can't understand why he didn't say so instead of writing nonsense. It was nonsense that he wrote. "Preposterous" does not mean "unfair" or "such as cannot be agreed to." It means "headmost first," or, as we often say, "topsy turvy." If I put the cart before the horse I act in a preposterous manner. "Alternative," too, is often abused. It means "a choice between two courses," and between two only; yet I have heard Mr. Gladstone's celebrated three courses spoken of as three alternatives. If I were to speak of the three horns of a dilemma, thereby entirely overlooking the meaning of "dilemma," which is equivalent to a "catching between two things." Even good authors are guilty of misusing the verb "to partake of," which simply means "to take part in" or "to share in." Recollecting this, we find but little sense in such sentences as the following. The condemned man, previous to his execution, partook of an excellent breakfast," or "the solitary wanderer in the forest partook of a great intellectual enjoyment as he listened to the nightingale's song." A murderer does not usually share his breakfast with other people; a solitary wanderer certainly cannot share intellectual enjoyment, seeing that there is no one with whom to share it. The misuse of words like "partake" is often due, I think, to a feeling on the part of a writer that simple language is inelegant. "He had breakfasted," or "he breakfasted," is as rough or unpolished; "he partook of his morning refection" looks rather well. That is the fallacious process of thought which leads to so much nonsense being written and spoken. But it is not only the misuse of words that I want to talk about. A great deal of written and spoken nonsense is nonsense, not because words are misused, but because they are ill placed. Here are some examples: 1. "He blew out his brains, after saying good bye to his wife with a blunderbuss." 2. "Being early killed, I sent a party in search of his mangled body." 3. "I could not cross examine my children in the family history of Sir Charles Grandison and Harriet Byron, as Lord Macaulay sometimes did." 4. "We complimented them upon discussing matters which were in some countries found irritating in so calm a way." 5. "A lantern of linen and embossed copper hangs from the centre, thick Turkey carpets cover the ground and an enormous knob of brass, about six feet high, surmounts it." 6. "He had jumped into the river after fastening a rope round his neck, the end of which was fastened to a big stone." 7. "A tent large enough to contain 50 persons of fine workmanship." As regards the first example, I fail to see how a man can say good-bye to his wife with a blunderbuss. As regards the second, if the writer was early killed, how does he manage to write afterward of how he sent out a party, etc.? The third sentence is a gem from Sir Henry Holland's "Recollections." I don't know what it implies; but it may imply that Lord Macaulay was in the habit of catechising either his own children or Sir Henry's on the subject of Sir Charles Grandison; or that he was in the habit of cross-examining his own children on some other topic. In sentence four I read about matters being irritated in so calm a way and I feel quite sure that that is not quite what the author intended me to understand from his words. In five, I am puzzled to know what it was that the knob of brass surmounted. Syntax answers that it was the ground; but I suspect that it may have been the centre of the lantern. In six I learn for the first time that a man can tie the end of his neck to a stone. In seven I make the acquaintance of fifty people of fine workmanship; and, I am sure, I am proud to know them. A simple arrangement of words will set most of these curious sentences right. What a pity it is that the writers did not make the simple rearrangement instead of leaving their readers to do it!—Cassell's Saturday Journal.

A Convicts' Eden.

A paper was read by the Rev. T. S. Lea, at the Geographical Society last night on the Island of Fernando do Noronha. This island is the Brazilian convict settlement, and is about two hundred and ninety miles northeast of Pernambuco. Mr. Lea was one of a party of three, and was engaged in collecting specimens for the British museum. Three-quarters of the insects taken were new to science; of plants there were 290 species, of which about thirty were peculiar to the island. Crabs of great alacrity ran about on the rocks and leaped from one stone to another, while crayfish and cuttlefish abounded. Fish of the most gorgeous colors—gold, green, violet and scarlet—abounded. There were no fresh-water fish. About fourteen hundred convicts were on the island, and besides them 160 soldiers and 400 women and children. The convicts met with were neither degraded nor ruffianly, and discipline was maintained without difficulty.—London Star.

IMPRISONED BY THE TIDE.

The Perilous Experience of a Party of Daring English Boys.

Eleven boys, ranging in age from 11 to 14 years, had a most extraordinary adventure on the beach at Seaham Harbor on Saturday. At the south side of the town there is a rock projecting from the mainland, known as Nose Point, on the top of which is built the Vane and Seaham blast furnaces. Underneath is a large cavern, locally known as the "Smugglers' Cave," which, at high tide, is filled by the sea. Among the boys referred to the exploration of this cave and the unearthing of treasures of some buccaneer of the past had long been an object to be accomplished and a determination was at last come to to carry out the project at the first fitting opportunity. Saturday was fixed upon for the day of search, and they started off, headed by a trusty leader and provided with candles, lanterns, torches, a pick and shovel. Entering the cavern at low water, they commenced work, and soon were so intent upon the object of their labors that they never heeded the turn of the tide, and it was only when they found escape from the cave by the way they had entered impossible that they realized their position. The water drove them further and further back into the cave, until at length they found it impossible to recede further. To avoid the rise of the water several of the boys climbed as high up the walls of the cave as possible. Others had no alternative but to stand pressed up against the end of the cavern and allow the water to gradually creep in upon them. Higher and higher rose the water, and deeper and deeper the lads became immersed, until some of them were covered up to the shoulders. They all managed, however, to keep erect, notwithstanding their weakened condition, produced by shouting for help and numbness from being compelled to stand in the water. Now and then a broken wave would dash in among them, rendering their position still more perilous. Moreover, the cave was nearly dark, and the lads' lights having been put out, except one, which had escaped the wash of the waves and continued to give forth its feeble illumination. One of the boys at last, from sheer want of strength, was washed from his hooning; but soon another lad standing near groped in the dark, and, with nothing but the cries of his comrade to guide him, succeeded in restoring him to his feet. In the meantime the lads had been missed from their homes, and their continued absence caused inquiries to be made. This resulted in their whereabouts becoming known. A rumor then got abroad that all the boys had been drowned, and soon fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters and a large body of other men, women and children rushed all in eager haste to the top of the cliff. There was no way of reaching them from the shore, nor was there any possibility of going down the precipitous face of the cliff with ropes. Nothing could therefore be done by the hundreds of people who had collected but to wait until the fall of the tide would admit of access to the cave from the shore. Meanwhile the imprisoned boys passed a terrible time; but just when they thought the worst had come the water stopped rising. Slowly the water left the cave, and in a short time they felt themselves in comparative safety, although in darkness. It was, however, 10:30 o'clock at night before they were rescued.—Newcastle Chronicle.

The Smart Youngsters.

A Remarkable Memorial.

One of the most interesting memorials of the Queen's Jubilee is the plantation of an entire mountain in North Wales with forest trees, so arranged that the words "Jubilee, 1887," appear distinctly amidst the surrounding trees, through the bulk of the plantation being of a different foliage. The mountain thus adorned is Moel Rhiwen, in the parish of Llanddeiniolen, on the estate of Mr. Assheton Smith. The word "Jubilee" is planted on the northwest side of the mountain in letters each measuring 200 yards by 25 feet wide. Plants of the Austrian pine form the body of the letters, which are shaded on the right with a bordering of larch. The intervening spaces are covered with a mixture of Scotch fir, pines, oak, birch, sycamore and spruce fir. The first tree of the letter "J" was planted last fall at a Jubilee celebration, and the work was completed last week. Nearly 200 men of the district have found constant employment, and they have planted about 630,000 trees. Till the plantation is in full leaf the letters will be scarcely traceable, but each year they will become more distinct, and a generation hence the mountain will be one of the sights of Wales, as the word "Jubilee" will then be seen a distance of many miles.

CURRENT TOPICS.

According to recent advices from West Africa, the son of one of the kings, known as Grand Jack, having died, human victims were barbarously sacrificed in honor of the occasion. "Pass" water was given them—a poisonous liquor—and when under its influence they were pitched into the surf. When the bodies were carried ashore by the waves they were cut with knives, men, women and children joining in the inhuman work. The chief of the tribe flies the British flag, and the captain of a trading vessel remonstrated with him in vain.

Consumptive patients are advised by a pupil of Liebig, in the Apotheke Verein, to live in rooms where one or two drachms of sulphur are melted on a hot stove. The first ten days bring increased cough and irritation, then these cease and the patient improves rapidly. Persons with catarrh and in early stages of consumption apply to enter chemical factories, where large quantities of sulphur are evaporated daily, and are cured in a few weeks by the inhalations. Cholera and epidemic diseases are never found in such factories.

The Scotch Crofters' Commission have issued a batch of decisions in the applications for fair rents recently heard at Dingwall, and the reductions are more sweeping over all than any yet granted. There were in all 150 cases, and in these the total rental has been reduced from £1,150 11s. to £955 17s., a reduction of over 35 per cent. The total arrears due have been reduced from £1,693 12s. 11d. to £920 8s. 8d. or about 55 per cent. of a reduction. On the Highfield estate the reduction is nearly 57 per cent. on the rental and 82 per cent. on arrears; and the tenants of the Duchess of Sutherland, who occupy crofts overlooking Strathpeffer Spa, have had their rents reduced 30 per cent., and 34 per cent. of their arrears cancelled.

Dr. F. F. Long, of San Francisco, has begun suit against the relatives of Miss Lizzie Hammond, who died recently, to recover possession of her skull. He had saved the woman's life when it was supposed she was dead from a broken neck as the result of a five-story fall, and before she died in the small-pox hospital she promised him her skull and upper vertebrae in the interest of science. Her relatives, however, buried the body and refused the demand of the doctor for any portion of the remains. Hence the medical man's determination to bring suit.

At Bournemouth, England, the streets are sprinkled very successfully with salt water, which is conducted from the ocean to certain hydrants. The salt water is found particularly advantageous for macadamized roads, as it seems to make the immediate surface more compact. It is further found that the surface holds the moisture about three times as long when watered with fresh water.

Dr. Jurisch, an Austrian chemist, has invented the most destructive fluid known to man. This fluid, when brought into contact with the air, after the explosion of a shell in which it is held, becomes a gas, which destroys all living things within its reach, melts metals and sets everything inflammable on fire.

Sir John Millais, the English artist, advises art students from this continent to serve their novitiate in England rather than in France. If they go to France, he says, "they will come away with a bad French accent, not alone on their tongues but on their brushes."

Charles Dickens' nurse, Mary Weller Gibson, was buried recently. She was generally regarded as the prototype of Mary, the pretty housemaid, in the "Pickwick Papers." She always upheld the theory that Micawber was real. Dickens' father. She was, of course, competent to form a judgment in the matter.

Prince Alexander of Battenberg is thus described by the London Times. "He is one of the most brave, most gentle, most generous and most handsome of living princes. In all the idyls of poetry there was not, indeed, been a more perfect hero. The whole story of his campaign against the Servians sounds like an epic."

Seizures in the Russian army are said to be cured of intemperance by a curious and heroic method. The inebriate is locked up and given only food boiled in his favorite wretched spirit and water. He soon becomes horribly sick, but is kept on this diet until the very sight or scent of the spirit creates in him an inextinguishable loathing for it.

Remus may be made, says our Chicago namesake, in passing upon the extraordinary fact that after eighteen centuries of Christianity the nation claiming to be foremost in Christendom is asking for more war material, more food for powder, more defences, more weapons of destruction, all evidences that peace and good will to man is not the ruling spirit of this more than of any pagan age.

According to experiments mentioned in Indian Engineering the tensile strength of a wet rope is only one third that of the same rope when dry, and a rope saturated with grease or soap is weaker still, as the lubricant permits the fibres to slip with greater facility. Hemp rope contracts strongly on being wet, and a dry rope twenty-five feet long will shorten to twenty-four feet on being wet.

A European continental paper has some amusing records of what it calls "the insane desire of the Englishman to marry his deceased wife's sister." Whenever, says the writer, the Englishman has nothing better to do he is occupied in agitating in favor of the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. He occasionally has a little war in South Africa, in Egypt or in Afghanistan, but he always comes back to his Bill. It is the passion of his life to marry his deceased wife's sister. Now, seeing how strong and general his passion is in England, why doesn't the Englishman marry his wife's sister to begin with? It is surely absurd of him to go on marrying the wrong woman, and then to wait for death and the law to right him.

A LIFE ROMANCE.

How a Buffalo Newspaper Man Got a Wife.

A first-class romance comes from Buffalo and in it a newspaper man plays a prominent part. His name is George M. Bailey, and until recently he was employed on the Buffalo Express. Two years ago he married and went to work in New York as a reporter. His wife and child were buried in one grave and he returned to Buffalo broken-hearted. His first assignment was to report a missionary meeting, and there he listened to the report of a female missionary employed on the Cattaraugus reservation, which deeply interested him, although he sat so he could not see her face. Her voice haunted him afterward, and learning her name, he wrote to her, offering to assist the cause as he could in the paper. She replied; he published her letter, sought to arouse interest in the Young Men's Christian Association, and finally decided to go out to the reservation and see for himself. He obtained a day off, as he had been working overtime and was much exhausted. He called upon the lady missionary, Miss Ball, whose mother was visiting her, and on reaching the house was suddenly taken ill, fell into a fever and for weeks was a very sick man. The two women nursed him as if he were a son and a brother. When he realized his position he was too weak to arise from his bed. Pity, sympathy, confidence followed one another fast, and when the reporter had told the story of his life, his grief, his struggles to live down the past, and his utter loneliness, the reserved, self possessed girl missionary said simply: "I have been waiting for you," and their troth was plighted in tears of sympathy. It seems that she had lost a dearly beloved brother, who was studying at an Episcopalian theological seminary on the Hudson, and she, too, had been heart broken. Then it was she conceived the idea of carrying out the life-work begun by him, and accepted the position on the reservation. The brother was born in the same month of the same year as Mr. Bailey, his death occurred within a few days of that of Mr. Bailey's wife, and from the same cause (heart disease), and the two resembled each other in height, voice and general appearance. The almost identical position of the two young people left alone in the world, and their meeting, included a further chain of coincidences too detailed to narrate, but the finale is soon told. They were married, and may their union be a happy one.—Albany Times.

Recipes for the Ladies.

A Delicious Way to Prepare Deviled Ham.—One pint of chopped boiled ham, with a good proportion of fat; one tablespoonful of flour, one teaspoonful of sage, one teaspoonful of pepper, one-half cupful of boiling water; press in a mould, place in a cool place until it becomes firm, and serve, cut in slices.

Potato Croquettes.—Take six boiled potatoes, pass them through a sieve, add four tablespoonfuls of minced cooked veal, a little grated nutmeg, salt and pepper to taste; and two tablespoonfuls of melted butter and the yolks of three or four eggs, form them into balls, roll them in cracker crumbs and fry in hot lard.

Onion Fricasse.—Peel two dozen small white onions and sprinkle with salt, let them stand half an hour, then roll them in a cloth to dry; dredge lightly with flour, put in a stew pan in which has been melted two ounces of butter, and place over the fire for five minutes; drain the fat from the onions, add a pint of rich milk, a little pepper, salt and a dessertspoonful of butter; simmer fifteen minutes and serve in the sauce.

Egg Chowder.—Take six potatoes of medium size, three eggs, four crackers, one quart of milk, a slice of salt pork and one onion; prepare pork the same as for fish chowder, add potatoes sliced, milk and onion, and salt and pepper to taste, when the potatoes are nearly cooked, add the eggs, well beaten, and the crackers.

A Addition to Soups. A good addition to soup is made by cutting bread into dice or square pieces and frying them in butter until they are browned on every side. They can be served at the table with the soup or added a short time before it is removed from the fire.

Maryland Biscuit.—One quart of flour, one teaspoonful of salt, two tablespoonfuls of lard worked into the flour, moisten with sufficient water to make very stiff dough, work it well, then lay it on a board and pound it until it is smooth and soft, and until the dough cracks as you work it; make into small, flat biscuits, lay them in a pan and bake in a moderate oven. Serve cold.

Date Cake.—One cup of butter, two cups of sugar, one cup of sour milk, four eggs, one pound of dates, one teaspoonful of soda; if sweet milk is preferred, add two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar. Remove stones from dates and cut in small pieces.

Drop Cookies.—One cupful of butter, two cupfuls of sugar, three eggs, one half teaspoonful of soda, one teaspoonful of cream of tartar; add flour until batter is the consistency of loaf cake; drop in tins and bake in a quick oven.

Apple Eggs.—Pare and core a convenient number of apples; leave them whole; sprinkle well with sugar and cover with water, and place in the oven; when nearly baked, take eggs, prepared as for an omelet, pour over the apples, and return to the oven for about ten minutes; grate over them nutmeg, and serve with cream or nice milk.

Tip-top Cake.—Beat well together two eggs, one and one-half cupfuls of sugar, a little salt, a little nutmeg, two tablespoons of butter, one teaspoonful of cream of tartar, one-half teaspoonful of soda dissolved in a cup of milk, two and one-half cupfuls of flour.

Railroad Pudding.—One cupful of molasses, one cupful of suet, one cupful of sweet milk, four cupfuls of flour, one teaspoonful of saleratus and one teaspoonful of salt, one cupful of chopped raisins, one cupful of currants; warm the molasses and stir the saleratus into it; mix suet with flour; then stir altogether and steam four hours.

Mountain Dew Pudding.—One pint of milk, the yolks of two eggs, two tablespoonfuls of cocoanut, one-half a cupful of cracker crumbs and one teaspoonful of lemon extract; bake one-half an hour; make a frosting of the whites of two eggs and one-half a cupful of sugar; spread over the top of the pudding, and return to the oven to brown slightly; the quantity can be doubled if a larger pudding is required.

The total assessment of the township of Bentinck is $1,252,960.

Mr. S. P. Hodgson has the contract for building the new Methodist church at Shelburne for $5,000.

Mr. Isaac Traynor has appealed against the whole assessment roll of Dundalk, and there will, accordingly, be fun at Court of Revision there.

Two young men at Horning's Mills have got themselves into trouble. It is alleged that they indulged in the dangerous pastime of opening certain letters which passed through the post office there. At any rate both of them have been committed for trial.

Mr. Wright, of Wareham,—who so violently and persistently denounced the new roller process for manufacturing flour—has gone back on his record, having recently succumbed to the foresight and sound reasoning of THE ADVANCE by putting in the rollers.

A Mulmur young man and his girl went into a school-house the other day in order to avoid meeting some people who were coming down the road. Somebody saw them go in and propped rails against the door. The young man had to go through quite a little circus performance before he succeeded in liberating himself and his girl.

Three years for Burglary.—On Friday, Joe Gahan, who had pleaded guilty to burglarizing Mann's fruit store several weeks ago, was sentenced by P. M. Pattullo to three years in the reformatory at Penetanguishene. Gahan is about sixteen years old, and lost his father and mother seven years ago. He will have an opportunity of learning a trade in the reformatory.—[Dufferin Post

On Wednesday of last week a three year old child of Mr. Geo. Scott, of this town, was poisoned by chewing the plant commonly known as Monkshood, and but for the prompt action of Mr. Scott in administering the proper antidotes the child would have died. As this plant is to be found in many gardens, parents should be careful that their children are kept away from it.—[Mt. Forest Representative.

The only child of Mr. Miles Wilson, a fine promising little boy about a year and a half old, was drowned yesterday afternoon. The accident happened in this way: Mrs. Wilson had gone to see her mother in-law and had taken the child with her in its carriage. Mrs. Wilson went into the house and left the little one standing at the door, when it started off and pushed the carriage across the road where it ran into a pool of water about a foot in depth. The little boy was also pulled in and fell upon his face and was not discovered until life was extinct.—[Durham Chronicle.

For a long time past there has been trouble and a great deal of litigation between Chas. Willoughby and Wm. North, two farmers of the second line of Proton. Matters came to a climax last Saturday. Accounts that have reached us go to show that on that day Willoughby was engaged in putting up a fence when North and his wife came along, and that without provocation North assaulted Willoughby with an axe, striking him on the forehead just above the eye with the back of the weapon, and again on the back, breaking a rib and inflicting serious bruises. Willoughby came to Shelburne to interview a doctor and a magistrate. Dr. Norton did what he could for the man, but Proton being in the county of Grey our local magistrates recommended him to go to Dundalk for justice. We shall probably be able to give further information in regard to this case next week.—[Shelburne Economist.

A young lady—who shall be nameless, of course—was hunting eggs not long since, when she thoughtlessly placed one in the pocket of her dress. She forget all about it until Sunday afternoon, when she became disagreeably aware of its presence from the fact that it had accidentally got smashed. She was in Sunday School at the time, but did not hesitate to make her way outside and rid her pocket of the unwelcome intruder. Moral—don't carry eggs in your pockets!

The Sons of Temperance held a conversazione in their Hall in Christoe's block on Wednesday evening of last week. The chemical experiments, which were under the supervision of Dr. Christoe and Messrs. Shore, C. J. Sproule, and W. Latimer, proved quite interesting and instructive. The za-za band created much mirth, while the galvanic battery proved to be one of the chief centres of interest. The musical part of the program was ably sustained by Miss Christoe and the Misses Beecroft.

Died.

NOBLE.—On the 29th ult., at Toronto, Minnie Noble, daughter of Mrs. W. M. Clark, Flesherton, aged 20 years.

[Deceased was converted under the Salvation Army in 1885, of which she was a happy and active member up to the time of her death. She was stricken down with typhoid fever in September last and was sent to Toronto Hospital for treatment. Here she remained for some time and then went home, returning however in April. A week prior to her decease she was taken suddenly worse, and her mother was telegraphed for. The latter found her daughter speechless but conscious. Shortly afterwards she passed happily to her long home. Deceased was born in Artemesia. Her remains were brought to Flesherton on Thursday last and interred in the cemetery next day. The service at the house was conducted by Rev. J. W. Shilton, B.A., and the service at the grave by Rev. Walter Ayers. On Sunday Rev. Mr. Shilton improved the occasion by preaching a powerful sermon in the Methodist church.]

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

"Will you tell us the circumstances, Lady Eastwell, which induced you to think the prisoner at the bar guilty of the crime of which he is accused?"

"I know that he hated Sir Hugh Glynn, and I overheard him threaten to kill him."

"When was that?"

"Four years ago. I know that he has had bitter cause for enmity against him."

"You saw them start together on the morning of the eleventh?"

"Yes."

"Who had suggested Sir Hugh's accompanying the prisoner?"

"I cannot remember; but, to the best of my recollection, it was the prisoner."

"Was Sir Hugh an ill-tempered man, at all given to quarrelling?"

"Certainly not."

"And the prisoner?"

Alice's lips tightened.

"I have seen him violently incensed."

"Were Sir Hugh and his wife living on amicable terms?"

"No, certainly not. My cousin never made any secret of her dislike to her husband."

"I think on one occasion, and even more than one occasion, you heard her express considerable dislike to him?"

"I heard her wish she could kill him."

"Was she alone?"

"No; she spoke to the prisoner."

"My lord, with your permission, I will examine this witness," said Mr. Montagu, just as Alice was leaving the box; and something in the great lawyer's keen, critical, rather satirical look, disturbed Lady Eastwell's exquisite self-possession.

Very keen and quiet and to the point were his questions—trifling and indifferent almost they seemed; but, when Lady Eastwell left the witness-box, she felt that he had entirely altered the character of her evidence, that he had put Guy Stuart before the jury as an injured, forgiving man who had nobly borne bitter and terrible wrongs. Other witnesses followed, with more or less important evidence against the prisoner; but, on the whole, when the Court adjourned for luncheon, it was evident that the case for the prosecution was a weak one, the only real evidence against the prisoner being the stick which had been found beside the body.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

After luncheon the business proceeded rather languidly, until the last witness for the prosecution was summoned; and then, amid a low murmur of excitement and distress, a slight figure in black, leaning on the arm of Mr. Grey, the Vicar of Easton, appeared in the witness-box, holding the rail in front of her with one slight hand, but gently declining any other support; and, as the deep gray eyes rested upon her, the prisoner's firm lips trembled and his hand shook.

"I must ask you to remove your veil."

The lawyer's quiet voice had a touch of sympathy in it, and the cold keen eyes did not look at her with unconcerned gaze—they were somewhat troubled, for the Queen's lawyer had a pretty daughter at home of Shirley's age, and he felt for her terrible position.

She lifted her veil at once, and the face which she disclosed was so terribly altered that the loving, longing eyes which watched her so anxiously grew suddenly dim. It was perfectly colorless—even the lips were pale; and in the sweet eyes was a strange hunted expression, very sad to see, as she stood there, her hand clasping the rail, her lovely little statuesque face framed in the heavy folds of crape of her widow's bonnet.

"Thank you," the lawyer said gently, shrinking himself from the task before him—the attempt to make Shirley bear testimony against the man whom she loved and who loved her; and, after the necessary preliminaries had been gone through, there was a little pause.

"I think there is no need to distress this witness by repetition," the lawyer said, apologetically almost, as he fingered his papers rather nervously.

"You can only corroborate, Lady Glynn, what previous witnesses have stated as to the circumstances of your marriage. They were correct, I presume?"

"Yes." The voice was perfectly steady, but very low.

"How long had you been Sir Hugh's wife when you met the prisoner?"

"I think it was four years and a few months after that that Major Stuart returned to England."

"Had you seen or heard anything of him in that interval?"

"No—not one word."

"When he and your husband met, did they meet as friends?"

"Yes."

"But they had parted bitterest foes?"

"Major Stuart had been cruelly wronged.'

"And he had uttered threats of vengeance?

"He was in great trouble," Shirley answered tremulously, lifting her eyes for a moment and turning them upon the judge with an earnest entreating look.

"We can easily understand his distress, but to cherish vengeance during such a long period is not so easily understood."

"But he did not;" and, as she spoke, Shirley's little hands met in a close clinging clasp. "He forgave my husband. He had promised his uncle on his death-bed that he would forgive the wrong, and he did so."

"Will you repeat that statement, Lady Glynn?"

His Lordship himself had interposed with the question, and he was leaning forward with some interest on his grave face.

"Major Stuart promised his uncle on his death-bed that he would forgive Sir Hugh," she said earnestly. "Sir Jasper Stuart was dying, and our marriage was hastened that I might be introduced to him, as he was Major Stuart's only relative; but, when Sir Hugh claimed me, Guy—Major Stuart—had to return alone; and it was then that Sir Jasper entreated him to promise that he would never attempt to be revenged for the wrong done to him."

"And Major Stuart gave the promise?"

"Yes."

"When did you hear of this, Lady Glynn?"

"Major Stuart told me of it shortly after his return."

"On what occasion?"

"I was thanking him for meeting Sir Hugh not only with courtesy, but with kindness," she answered unsteadily.

"Is it a fact, Lady Glynn, that you and Sir Hugh were not living on amicable terms?"

"We were not happy," Shirley said, simply, a faint, pained flush rising in her face.

"Sir Hugh was very kind and indulgent to you?"

"Yes—always."

"Then we may conclude that it was you who could not forgive the deception that he practiced upon you?"

"It was very hard and wicked," the young widow said faintly. "But we were friends before he—he died."

"I am afraid you are not very strong; will you rest a little now?"

"I am quite able to go on," she said simply.

"What induced you to forgive your husband and become reconciled to him?"

"Major Stuart had—no, do not trouble, I am not faint—Major Stuart had told me how sinful I had been to cherish my resentment, and he had urged me to become reconciled."

She spoke with a brave simplicity and sincerity which carried conviction with them; and the lawyer for the prosecution saw that he was losing ground.

"The prisoner seems to have been quite a Mentor," he said, with a slight sneer. "Do you believe in his innocence, Lady Glynn?"

Shirley lifted her wondering eyes.

"I have not doubted it for a moment," she said, with a great earnestness; and, as she spoke, her eyes met Guy's for the first time, and in the swift glance they exchanged there was a whole world of love and fath and trust.

"Unfortunately every one else is not so trusting. One witness has stated to-day that he overheard you say to Major Stuart that you wished you could kill your husband. Is the statement correct?"

"I think I said so; but I spoke under great excitement. I was very unhappy. I did not mean the words."

"They were said to the prisoner?"

"Yes—they were uttered before him."

"Ah! That will do, Lady Glynn."

The trial went on; witness after witness spoke in favor of Guy, men who had been his brother officers for years, men of standing and weight who were his friends. Oswald Fairholme spoke eagerly and earnestly in Guy's behalf; but he could not deny that he had seen the two men in bitter enmity and heard threats of deadly vengeance exchanged. The Vicar of Lynmouth testified to Major Stuart's shocked surprise and grief, and his immediate return to Easton on hearing the tidings.

The afternoon wore on; lamps were lighted in the crowded court-house as the counsel for the defence began his speech, an earnest, eloquent defence, which made many a heart thrill. There was no proof against the prisoner, none but the discovery of his stick near the dead man; and this was easily explained by the fact that he had lent it to Sir Hugh at his own request. No high words had ever passed between them since they had met again. On the contrary, the accused had shown a noble forbearance and a true spirit of Christian forgiveness to one who had so cruelly injured him. The death of Sir Hugh Glynn was wrapt in mystery certainly. The medical testimony tended to prove that death had ensued from the blow on his head; but medical science was not infallible, and it was not impossible, as one of the medical men present had acknowledged, that the blow which had caused Sir Hugh's death had been received in another way—by a fall, an accident. The jury had heard, he continued, the testimony of several persons whose position in society and general conduct rendered their evidence beyond all question, and they had doubtless been surprised that such a charge had been made against a man whose antecedents were so unexceptionable and who bore such a high character for courage, honor, and nobility. They had heard too the evidence of the unhappy lady with whom, he was sure, one and all of them had sympathized that day; they had heard how cruelly she and the prisoner had been deceived, how basely the latter's trust in his friend had been betrayed, and yet with what nobility, with what forbearance he had behaved—how he had left England and put the width of the world between him and the woman he loved when she was another man's wife—how during four long years he had wandered over foreign countries, leaving a splendid estate without a master, rather than enter into temptation and meet Lady Glynn, until he could meet her as an honest man should meet another man's wife and how when he returned and they had met again, he had used all his interest to induce her to forgive her husband, and had indeed been a peace-maker between them.

And so the afternoon wore on, and the eloquent words so full of power and conviction rolled forth over the silent audience, so intent and grave; and many eyes filled with tears as the listeners thought of the blighted lives and the fatal love which had brought such misery in its wake; and Lady Eastwell's eyes darkened with anger and disappointment as she saw how kindly looks were cast upon the prisoner, and how the anxiety was dying out of Mr. Harcourt's eyes. And Shirley listened likewise, with every sense quickened by anxiety and fear, and her eyes sought the judge's face with keen strained questioning, trying to read Guy's fate in that impassive countenance, and leaving it with a weary baffled glance to scan the faces of the twelve jurymen in whose hands that fate lay.

Then, when, amid a loud, yet instantly repressed, murmur of applause, the eminent counsel sat down, the judge summed up briefly and impartially, yet disclosing unmistakably his belief in the prisoner's innocence, a belief shared by many others there and then.

As the jury left the court to consider their verdict, the lights, the eager faces all faded from before Shirley's eyes, and there was a slight commotion as Mr. Grey lifted the slender motionless girl and carried her out, followed by many a pitying glance; so that Shirley did not hear the verdict given which enabled Guy Stuart to leave the court a free man. Surrounded by rejoicing friends, and with a dazed bewildered look on his face, as, coming from the crowded court-house into the sweet cool evening air, he lifted his hair from his brow with a gesture of intense relief, he stood once more under the blue sky, in which the stars were already peeping out one by one, a free man.

Free—yet with the stain upon him still, for, until the murderer of Sir Hugh Glynn was discovered, there would be many who, notwithstanding the acquittal given by his fellow-countrymen, would believe him guilty of the crime of which he had been accused.

CHAPTER XXXV.

"Guy, dear fellow, we are all so glad and thankful!" Oswald Fairholme remarked huskily, when he was alone with Guy in the sitting-room at the Exminster Arms an hour later, looking with earnest sympathizing dark eyes at Major Stuart, as he lay back in a deep arm-chair, worn and haggard and wearied.

"Thank you, Fairholme, I am sure of that," Guy said, making an effort to rouse himself and forcing a smile to his lips. "I have no words, old friend, to thank you for all the kindness and friendship you have shown me."

"Nonsense!" Oswald returned rather unsteadily. "I wish you would try to eat something, old man; you look wretchedly ill."

"Do you think a good dinner would put some flesh on my bones?" was the smiling inquiry. "I'm all right, Oswald; but of course the last six weeks were not calculated to improve one's appearance; and then," he added with a sudden break in his voice, "do you think I can forget that I am a dishonored man, acquitted of a crime certainly, but with my innocence still unproved—a man who in the eyes of half England has but escaped a just condemnation because there was not sufficient proof to hang him?"

He rose, with an abrupt restless movement, and went over to the window looking upon the street where the gas-lamps were burning, and where groups of people were still standing discussing the event of the day; and Oswald glanced at him with the same earnest sympathy and compassion.

"No one whose opinion is worth having thinks so, Guy," he said eagerly. "It is of course impossible but that you should feel this somewhat at first; but by and by the feeling will wear off. None of your old friends are likely to look coldly at you."

"Do you think that every one is as true and staunch as yourself, Fairholme?" Guy said, with a melancholy smile. "Why, even your sister and her husband——"

"Do not talk of them," Oswald Fairholme broke in quickly. "When I think of Alice's conduct, I feel bitterly ashamed and humiliated. Nothing in the world but her everlasting envy of that poor child's superior loveliness has been at the bottom of all her hatred and malice. Ah, Layton!"

"I thought I might come up," Captain Layton said, holding out his hand to Guy with a frank, unaffected, earnest manner which was new to him. "Major Stuart, let me congratulate you. We are all so heartily glad—not that we had any doubt as to what the verdict would be from the beginning. Miss Grey sent me up," he added, turning to Oswald, and carefully avoiding to look at Guy's face as he continued, "to tell you that Lady Glynn is much better, and that she fainted only from the heat and crush. She is almost herself now."

Guy looked up hastily, as if about to speak, but, apparently changing his mind, [illegible] sat down in his arm chair, [illegible] creeping over his face.

"That is all right," [illegible] "she bore up so well all day that I feared the long-continued strain had been too much for her. We owe Miss Grey and her sister a vast debt of gratitude," he added, smiling. "They are most charming girls, and it was worth enduring some trouble to secure such friends."

Captain Layton's face glowed delightedly. The only drawback to his happiness in his engagement to Ada Grey had been a lurking thought that his friends might think lightly of her because she was the daughter of an obscure country parson; but he was himself fast finding out that there is a far truer nobility in kindly natures than in high birth, and that it is worth, not rank, which is the grand desideratum. The young man's love for Ada had indeed changed him for the better; he was no longer recognizable as the languid, listless individual eager to flirt with Mrs. Beaudesert, and with no higher object in life than the adornment of his own person and the designing of some new fashion in cravats. The young exquisite had almost entirely disappeared, and an earnest, straightforward resolute man had replaced him. The terrible trouble which had fallen upon Lady Glynn had touched him greatly, and Sir Hugh's awful death had been a rude but salutary shock. He had spent the weeks before the trial at Easton, and his presence was an inestimable comfort to Ada, who was almost sorry afterward to think how happy she had been while Shirley was undergoing such sorrow and suffering.

"And I have to congratulate you," Major Stuart said, looking up with a smile. "You are a lucky fellow, Layton; Miss Grey is a most charming girl, and you are very much to be envied."

"Thank you," the young fellow returned, rather shyly. "Have you not dined yet?" he added, glancing at the barely touched dinner. "Because Lucie thought that perhaps you would come round this evening. They would be so glad to see you."

"Yes, we have dined," Captain Fairholme said hesitatingly; "but I want to write home. I have already telegraphed to my wife, but I know she will be anxious to hear all particulars. Would you care to go by and by, Stuart, or are you too tired?"

"By no means," Guy answered immediately. "I should like very much to go."

"Then I will tell them to expect you in about an hour," said the young officer cheerfully. "They will be delighted. You know the house, Fairholme, of course?"

"I ought to know it," Oswald answered laughingly, "considering that I was there three or four times yesterday and again this morning."

"All right then. Au revoir!" said Captain Layton as he left the room.

They heard his quick step on the stairs as he went down, and his voice humming a song; and, as it died away, a little spell of silence fell upon them both, broken at last by Oswald, who rang to have dinner removed. And while he was writing to Ruby, telling her all the particulars of the trial and its results, Guy Stuart sat leaning slightly forward in his chair, his head on his hand, his deep gray eyes with wistful yearning gaze studying the red glow of the fire. He was thinking of the Past and its misery; of the Present, with its strange uncertainty, and flickering lights and shades, and he was wondering what fate the Future had in store for him. Would it give him more loneliness, more sorrow, more wistful yearning for love and companionship, or would Shirley put her hands in his and go with him where he would—his wife at last! For there was no life between them now.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Guy had meant to meet Shirley quietly, and Lady Glynn had made a resolution that she would not distress him by any emotion; but, when they met in the firelit parlor of Mr. Jackson's little cottage, their calmness and courage were sorely tried.

She was waiting for him alone, standing, a slim black-robed figure, upon the bright flowered rug; and, when she entered, she turned and put out both little hands to him; and Guy bent over them as he took them in his and laid his face upon them in uncontrollable emotion. The long strain upon his nerves and endurance had overcome him at last, and the look in her eyes, so tender, so compassionate, so infinitely loving, broke down all his self-control. Shirley stood motionless, with her heart throbbing to suffocation. She was anxious to spare him as much as possible. She felt that it would be inexpressible comfort to throw herself into his arms and weep out all her misery upon his breast, but she knew that she must be brave for him now, for him who had so often been brave for her.

They were silent for some moments, the stillness of the little room being broken only by the great choking sobs which burst from Guy's sad heart; then, as Shirley felt she could bear it no longer, she said softly—

"Guy, you distress me. Dear, I cannot bear to see you thus."

At the sound of her voice he shivered; but making a great effort, he lifted his head, and, still keeping her hands in his, murmured a few broken words of thanks and blessing for her brave testimony for him that day; and, as her eyes rested on his face, so well beloved and so sadly altered, she could have cried out with pain at the change she saw there.

"Why are you thanking me, Guy?" she said tremulously. "Such thanks as those hurt me. Sit down and tell me of yourself. Oswald ought not to have let you come to-night. You look fit for nothing but rest."

She drew him gently toward the little sofa; and, as he sat down, still holding her hands in his and gazing at her fixedly as she bent ever him with such infinite pity and love, the fair face quivered and the beautiful eyes filled with tears.

"Guy," she said brokenly, "have you been ill? Have they hid it from me?"

"I have not been ill, my darling; but, of course, I have been somewhat troubled and anxious and grieved. But that is all over now. I need not be selfish any longer," he said huskily. "I can have thought for others. My poor, poor child, how terrible all this must have been to you!"

"I was not alone, Guy," she answered, looking down at him sorrowfully. "I found kind and dear friends who have been, oh, so good to me, dear!"

"Heaven bless them!" broke from his lips, as he drew her closer to him. "And yet, my dearest, you are so changed."

"Am I? You must not judge of my looks [illegible], because I am tired; and I should [illegible] unless of yours either," she continued, changed, and [illegible] told me you faltered for a moment—"and to-day I saw that you looked worn and ill, but—"

"If my appearance shocks you," he said, forcing a smile, "I will go away and not see you again until I have recovered my old looks. Oh, my darling"—he dropped his head on her shoulder as she stood beside him—"how can we be thankful enough, how can we show our gratitude? Shirley, once or twice in my loneliness there," he went on unsteadily, "it seemed to me that everything was going wrong here, that the most trivial words and actions would go against me. It seemed as if even heaven were against me."

"Guy, my dearest, hush!"

"It is such a relief to tell you, love!" he said, brokenly. "I had left you that morning so much happier. I had guessed that you and—and poor Hugh were friends, and I was thinking that there was a happy life of mutual love in store for you both in the future. Sweet, I know what you would say; but you are so young, and his love—once you had forgiven—could not have failed to win some return; and I was glad and thankful, my own—ah, I may call you so now, Shirley!—that it should be so—I was quite willing to go away and be forgotten, if you were happy; and that morning, Shirley, I meant to go away and not to see you again until I had conquered my love for you."

The tears were standing in his eyes, and Shirley, bending, put his dark hair—thickly besprinkled with white now—back from his brow, and then, with a sudden irrepressible tenderness, bent yet lower, and put her lips where her caressing hand had rested.

"My poor Guy!" she said softly.

"We were going over the cliffs, talking of anything and everything but the dear woman who was so near both our hearts, when Hugh turned to me suddenly, and, with a look in his eyes I had never seen there before—a look of such earnest gratitude and sorrow—asked me to forgive him the wrong he had done me in the past. He told me all, Shirley—how, rendered mad and desperate by his love for you, he had resolved to possess you by fair means or foul, and that, hearing your mother's story, my poor love, he determined to betray you as she had been betrayed. But he told me that from that night—do you remember it, my darling, when you followed me to Maxwell?—he had not known one happy hour. He had quite despaired of ever winning your love—how could you love, he said, where you had learned to despise? He assured me that then, had it been possible, he would have undone what he had done; but that, knowing that to be impossible, he had tried to brave it out. And we sat down on the cliff, and he told me, poor fellow—"

"Guy, rest now—you shall tell me another time," she entreated, seeing the terrible emotion under which he was laboring, and how unfit he seemed for further fatigue; but, after a moment, Guy lifted his head and went on earnestly:

"He told me what I had already guessed, that the wife he loved so dearly had forgiven him, and that, thanks to me, he should be happy again; and he thanked me in words which made me feel so unworthy when I remembered what a struggle I had had with myself. And he said that—but the words are too generous to be repeated—only, my darling, I must tell you this, for it seemed to me afterward that a foreboding of his sad end must have been upon him—he said that his was not a long lived family, and that there might be happy days in store for me with you in the future. Darling, it hurts you to hear this; forgive me."

"It does not hurt me," she answered, raising her eyes heavy with tears to his; she was kneeling by his side now, resting her head against his arm. "It takes so much of the pain away. Tell me all, Guy."

"When we parted—truer friends than we had ever been in life before—he asked me to give him my stick, and to let him send me one in exchange; and the last I saw of him was when he was standing gazing at me as I went, looking so strong and handsome and happy. My darling, I thank heaven that I had no bitter thoughts in my heart against him then!"

She pressed her head against him in silence, too deeply moved to speak as she thought of the brilliant career so suddenly cut short, the life so suddenly taken; and on Guy's face, as he sat by her side, there was a great weariness and pain and regret.

"It was a terrible end," he said, huskily, then. "Shirley, have you any idea who could have done that dreadful deed?"

She shook her head wearily.

"I did not know that he had an enemy," she said faintly. "Guy, could it not have been—could not have been an accident?"

"I fear not, my darling; and"—with an irrepressible burst of pain—"until this mystery is cleared up, I shall be a dishonored, crime stained man."

She lifted her head and looked at him.

"You dishonored—you crime-stained! But"—her breath came quickly as a new fear came into her eyes—"you have been acquitted, Guy!"

"Acquitted—yes; they had not proof enough to condemn me," he said bitterly; "but, until the guilty man is discovered, I am the guilty man, Shirley."

The Rector and the Bishop.

A New York correspondent of the Hartford Courant says: They are telling rather an amusing story of the good bishop. One of his daughters applied recently for confirmation in a certain large and flourishing evangelical church in this city. The rector gave a number of names, including hers, to one of his zealous young assistants, and bade him visit each candidate. The bishop lives in a handsome apartment up town, but the surroundings did not deter the Low Church pastor. He was going to fight the devil and his works wherever he might find them. The name suggested nothing, for there are Potters and Potters as well as Smiths and Smiths, both common enough trades in the days when a man's surname indicated his occupation. The candidate was not in, but her mother appeared. After an appropriate conversation the young clergyman said: "Where does your husband attend church?" "Well, he attends none regularly." "Very bad, very bad," said the minister severely. "This habit of running about is pernicious. Is he a church communicant?" "Yes." "Worse still; and what views does he hold? Is he high or low, or (with a broad [illegible] of the somewhat narrow chest), is wife, "Indeed, sir, [illegible] said the bishop's however, the assistant bishop [illegible] diocese, to which, I think, you belong. You had better put the question to him."

What Frightens Gladstone.

"I happen to know," says a London Star writer, "that a badly ventilated room is the one thing in the world Mr. Gladstone fears. During the general election there was a curious and pathetic episode which brings this out. Mr. Gladstone spoke in Manchester—I think it was in the Free Trade Hall—the crowd was terrible, the heat awful. Mr. Gladstone was very much affected by the badness of the atmosphere. Once or twice he had actually to stop in the middle of his speech, and he declared to those around him that he could not possibly go on. But with that noble resolution which has borne him through such mighty struggles to ultimate victory, he pulled himself together, declared that somebody should say what he had to say, and that if he didn't say it nobody else could; and he went on heroically to the end. He suffered a severe penalty, for he had to go to bed immediately after the speech and remain in bed for a whole day afterward."

In Church.

"Mamma," whispered a little boy, who had watched the preacher vigorously pound the pulpit cushion for some time.

"'Sh!"

"But, mamma, I—"

"'Sh! 'Sh! You musn't talk in Church."

"I only wanted to say that if I was that cushion, I'd—"

"'Sh!"

"I'd be all black and blue by this time," he squeaked.

"I Told You So."

Brown—"You don't look very happy, Robinson." Robinson—"No, I left off my flannels this morning and caught cold." Brown—"That's bad." Robinson—"Oh, I don't care anything about the cold; but my wife told me I was leaving them off too soon."

Iron in Milk.

De Leon has been making an extended investigation of the amount of iron in milk, and finds that cow's milk contains more of this constituent than either human or asses' milk. In asses' milk he found .0025 per cent. of iron, in human milk .0015 per cent., and in cow's milk .0040 per cent.—New York Mail and Express.

Probably the youngest bank president in the world is J. M. Bailey, jun., who, at the age of 23 years, has been placed at the head of the Minnehaha national bank, of Sioux City.

Joseph Haddon, of Liverpool, S. C., is probably the oldest engineer, in point of service, at least, in the United States. He has held a throttle since 1833, and in his youth was an apprentice of Robert Stevenson, at Newcastle-on-the-Tyne.

Somethin' to Say.

(WITH APOLOGIES TO J. W. RILEY.)

Somethin' to say, my daughter? Well, you bet,
I've somethin' to say!
Some fathers might let things take their course,
but your dad ain't built that way.
You see, I work for a livin' now, and I earn enough for two;
But I'll be whipped if I'm goin' to feed another along with you.

If you wanted to marry a decent man, who was earnin' decent pay,
Most likely I'd tell you to go ahead, and hurry
and set the day;
But I know the worthless dude you want, and I know his little lay.
Somethin' to say, my daughter? Well, you bet
I've somethin' to say!

Now, don't be cryin', daughter, and don't feel hard at me—
You'd know you'd better be single, if only you could see;
But to think of your marryin' such a man as lazy
young Dandy Jim
Though, 'f he knew enough to earn his salt, don't know's I'd object to him.

It isn't him at all, you say; but the old man millionaire?—
Why, child, you make your father proud; just let me kiss you—there!
And you want me to add my blessing, and come to the house and stay?
Well, I guess you can manage your own machine and I ain't got nothin' to say.

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

Latest Conceits in the Fashionable Attire of the Sex.

A TRIBUTE TO CANADIAN GIRLS.

Pink and White Maidens Whose Suitors are Swarthy.

(Cousin Kate's Weekly Contribution.)

A Man's Reasoning.

"The trouble with women," said Smitherimpkins, "is that they want us to have fun their way. They want us to sit in the house and talk about the weather, sir; to discuss the eternal mysteries of dressmaking and cooking, sir; and to read novels, sir, and worship babies. They can't see why a man should want to go to a club or a public dinner, sir, or take in a baseball game or a horse race. They want us to do as they do and enjoy ourselves their way, sir, But did you ever hear of a man wanting a woman to have fun his way? No, sir; not much, sir. You never heard of any man's trying to pursuade his wife to go around the corner, sir, to a nice quiet place, sir, where some very elegant gentlemen were engaged in a rubber of cards, sir, and to smoke cigars and drink beer with the party, sir, and sit up till the cock had made himself hoarse with crowing, sir, and then meander home singing. Did you ever hear of any man's trying to pursuade a woman to have fun that way—his way? No, sir; not by a jugful, sir."

Canadian Girls.

Are Canadian girls pretty? We rather, and, better still, they are all trained to make good housekeepers. There is not a young lady from the Red River to Labrador that cannot make the most tempting of wheat cakes as well as the rarer delicacies. They are good helpmates and never prove faithless.—New York Press.

Floral Weddings.

Floral weddings are the latest nuptial whim of wealthy people. At a recent ceremony the house of the bride's parents was transformed into a veritable bower of roses. The carpet [illegible] glistening white [illegible] the ceiling decorated with a delicate tracery of smilax, studded with pink and white roses; ropes of smilax and rosebuds draped the walk, while curtains of the same concealed the lace hangings of the bay window where the bridal couple stood. The mantels, stands, cabinet-shelves and window ledges were banked with moss and roses, while in the corners stood large, tall vases filled with roses of red and white. Throughout the whole house there was the same abundance of flowers, while the ball-room was decorated with tropical plants and festooned with rose wreaths. The musicians' gallery was draped with smilax and bonsilene buds, and the dining-room was decorated with a profusion of pink and white roses, white carnations and pink azaleas. The white cloth on the table was relieved by a broad band of pink silk plush laid down the centre, in the middle of which was a triple silver epergne upholding bowls of Venetian glass of pale pink, crowded full of pink and white buds, and the bridle cakes were wreathed with rosebuds.

The Best Anti-Fat.

A well-known physician writes: When a girl grows plump, entering her teens it is best not to meddle with nature rashly, as a reduction of fat in such a case has left epileptic seizures instead. The girl should leave school and take to music and quiet, steady work. It is a pity spinning is out of date. As a sedative exercise and for developing a fine hand and arm there is nothing to take its place. The beautiful Prudence, whose father held his manor by a king's favor, when asked in a silly way if she was not proud of her family possessions, made prompt answer, fit for a Greek girl: "No, I am not proud of our house or furniture or carriages or silver-ware or china, but I am proud of one thing—I know how to spin!" Sweet Mistress Prudence, send your taste and spirit again among our girls till they, like Helen of Troy and the wife of Odysseus, are seen by their own door in the sunshine spinning their purple thread.

Pretty Moorish Girls.

The women of Morocco, writes a recent traveller, are of all shades and colors, and I must say that some of the handsomest women I ever saw, both in feature and form, were full-blooded negresses. Another surprise was to notice that many of the Moorish beauties would show a snowy, rounded arm and a clear, pink and white skin that the most beautiful woman in Boston would have been glad to possess, but where they got this skin and complexion I could never find out, for the men, perhaps from their constant exposure to the sun, are tanned and blackened to the color almost of the negroes. In the country all is different, and little attempt is made by the women to be stingy with their charms, and to this freedom of the country many a poor, simple girl owes her position as prime favorite in the harem of some Moorish dignitary, who saw her perfections while travelling by her father's tent or hut.

The principal figure among the washers was a comely young woman of perhaps 20, with a bright, intelligent face and a form that could not be criticized, and as she swung her little body around I could not but fancy her in pink silk tights and satin slippers. When she found I had pockets and commenced to go through them to see what they contained, I felt the time had come for me to tell her there was only one woman in the world who had a right to go through my pockets for keeps, and so I tried to change the subject.

Our Grandmothers' Way.

The old-fashioned courtesy of our grandmothers, says a Washington correspondent, is being revived again, though in a modified form. At a recent reception at the White House a fair young girl was presented to the President. As he took her hand she ducked down about six inches with a movement which might be termed the lightning courtesy. The same little bob was repeated a moment later as she shook hands with Mrs. Cleveland. Some of the bystanders exclaimed: "How awfully country!" but were quickly subdued by an explanation coming from one of the initiated. The trick is the latest English custom on being presented to people of note. The movement is a difficult one, and if universally adopted the fair society belles will find some difficulty in perfecting themselves in the accomplishment, for, unlike their grandmothers, the early education of the modern girl in that respect has been neglected. Courtesies and backboards were long ago consigned to oblivion as old-fashioned and out of date. Now, together with the old spinning-wheels, they are being brought to light and favor once more.

Fashion Notes.

Striped trousers in dark tones, such as a rich brown or plum color, are the correct thing.

Trimmings of heavy moire ribbon are as much in vogue as ever. Black is the fashionable color.

Among the latest novelties in summer millinery is the "Jardina" garden hat, made of natural grass, braided.

Zebra-striped parasols, with extra wide bands, make a showy appearance among the gayly dressed throngs at the fashionable resorts this season.

Gigantic poke bonnets, made of colored straw, are going to be the correct thing at the seaside this summer for young ladies who are careful of their complexions.

The scarf-pin should be rigidly excluded from any combinations with the white mull or muslin tie for evening dress. But it has a resting-place an inch from the bow on the part of the tie flat against the collar.

Black net bonnets, which are now all the rage, are rendered very attractive by the substitution of real for artificial flowers. A lady on Broadway yesterday wore a large bunch of real Jacqueminot roses in fragrant prominence in front of her bonnet.

Every other hat on a woman's head decorated with two goose-quills. This one of fashion's most imperious decrees. They must be worn on the side of the hat, at an angle of thirty-five degrees. Sometimes they are gilded or silvered. Another fashion in women's head-gear is a cross between the turban and toque. It is flat and sets out around the head. The material should be the same as that of the frock.

Striped gauze makes as pretty a trimming as any on girls' round hats for country wear

Filmy laces play a part in this season's costumes so important[illegible] their white muslin lace-trimmed sunshade makes a charming accompaniment to a dainty summer costume.

Little children wear quaint little Shaker bonnets pique or drawn lawn. The little drawn hats are also very pretty and becoming.

Chamois gloves made on the Barritz model and stitched in white are very stylish for every-day wear for either shopping or driving, and have the advantage of being washable.

Sailor shapes, so youthful and becoming, are the hats which will be worn on all occasions where a serviceable head covering is desired.

Italian braids, otherwise Leghorns, are in many varieties of graceful shapes, and still promise to be the garden hats most popular the coming season.

Shoulder capes of cord passementerie are very stylish and new this season, and are in black or in colors. The fancy finish is in pendant drops or balls.

The Challi costume would hardly seem appropriate to the garden party or the class day fete, yet two of the prettiest possible costumes are now being made of this delicate woollen fabric which is fast taking the place of nun's veiling and albatross cloth.

The underskirt of bright red silk with a full drapery of flowered Challi, with a design of crysanthemums in variegated colors, is a description which does not do full justice to the lovely effect produced of a class day costume to be worn by one of this season's belles.

Copper Becoming Fashionable.

Copper is coming into fashion. What do I mean? Well, look at this lot of canes and umbrellas I have just imported. You will notice that each one of them has a piece of ordinary copper wire around the handle.

Gold and silver have become so common for these articles that people demand something new for a change, and you see the result before you. Just now great simplicity is affected in this respect, but I haven't the slightest doubt that when this metal becomes popular, as I believe it will, we shall see very elaborate personal ornaments made of it.

Indeed, I have often wondered why copper was not more generally used before this among civilized people as a material for ornaments. Its peculiar color harmonizes perfectly with dark materials and dark complexions, and it is comparatively free from oxidation. Barbarous? Not a bit of it! True, the aborigines made use of copper to adorn their persons, and in that they showed excellent judgment. In matters of taste we might frequently take a lesson from the savages.—Jewellers' Weekly.

There are probably 1,000 children in the city of Pittsburg who work in iron mills making bolts, nuts, hinges and barbed wire. Many of them are between the ages of 6 and 9 years.

A STAGE HERO.

How He Is Able to Make His Arm Sizzle With a Red Hot Poker.

When Robert B. Mantell was in Detroit recently, says the Journal, his act of burning out the wound in his arm made by the mad dog was very realistic. The poker was actually red hot, and he applied it fearlessly to the supposed wound. He hit the fond feminine hearts the hardest when he rushed on n. r., dumps Diana on a sofa, and says:

"Ma-a-a-n, look to your-r daughhter! I-I-I will attend to this scr-r-r-atch!"

Robert then shoves a poker into a colored glass fire, removes his red velvet coat, rolls up his shirtsleeves, and exposes a gory wound supposed to have been made by the fierce teeth of a mad dog. The wound is in the fleshy part of his forearm. He gazes upon it regretfully for a moment and then seizes a second poker which has been reposing all the time in a small plumber's furnace, concealed behind the table. He pauses, stretches out his arm, makes his hand a fist, while his mouth assumes an expression of intense determination. Another moment and the white hot poker is plunged into the bleeding wound. There is a sizzling sound. The smoke of burning flesh rises in a column and disappears among the flies. The red wound turns black before the eyes of the people. Waves of intense agony chase each other across the mobile features of the heroic Monbars. He slips his coat on and proceeds to say that he is a child of the people, but a billionaire, and wants to marry the girl he has saved. This is all very well, but the facts, it appears, are quite unromantic. Sewed upon Mantell's arm is a thick piece of canvas. It is colored with grease paint. Grease paint is laid onto the edges like putty, so as to conceal the joint just as the joint between an actor's forehead and a baldheaded wig is hidden. A small piece of fat bacon is glued upon the canvas and painted with red grease paint to look like a bloody wound. When the time comes Mantell slaps his hot poker into the bacon. It sizzles and smokes, the audience goes into mild fits, and Mantell tries to look as if he were losing a leg.

For and About Women.

Lady Dudley always sleeps between black silk sheets.

Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt wears a solitaire diamond ring that cost $48,000.

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

The Famous Author Slowly Nearing the Completion of Her Career.

American literature has many bright and noble women who have commanded respect and honor by their brain work, and while there is always to be found another to take the place of one whose earthly work has ceased, we cannot but feel a pang of sorrow at the laying down of a single pen. Yet such a sorrowful feeling must be endured by the thousands who have read and been profited by the works of Harriet Beecher Stowe. Not only has the gifted authoress laid by the pen that has carried so much pleasure to hundreds of homes, but the mind that guided the pen is almost faded from its possessor. Like Emerson, the latter part of Harriet Beecher Stowe's life finds her almost entirely bereft of that instrument of thought which has given the world such examples of the purest literature. In her Hartford home Mrs. Stowe is, as only a few days ago she herself expressed it, "simply waiting" for the call that cannot be far off. Gradually but surely is her mind failing her, and the intervals when she is the brilliant conversationalist of old are becoming more rare. None appreciate this fact more than her devoted family, who respond to her slightest call and fill with loving and ready hands her every want. An ardent hope with the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is said to be that she may live to see her immortal book dramatized according to her own ideal, and this it is the intention of a company of capitalists to carry out in Boston next fall. Preparations are already under way, and these have been carried on with the sanction of the author, who has given her indorsement of the proposed version. It is not probable that Mrs. Stowe will personally attend the representation, "But, oh, I shall be so glad," she said to a friend, "that the public is given my ideal of characters and story." It is in this production that she at present evinces the most interest, and in the moments of pleasant chat that are granted her she continually refers to it. Mrs. Stowe's authorized biography is already provided for by the family, who have placed much valuable material in the hands of Mrs. Florine Thayer McCray, a near neighbor and a warm friend of the author. This biography is now under way, and will probably appear shortly after the taking off of the illustrious subject, whose life and work give so much material for one of the most interesting works that could be written.

The Editor's Troubles.

If I was married, and I had a son who had a proclivity for asking questions—I'd kill him in cold blood.

There's a child in the same house with me. Her mother thinks she's a prodigy—I think she's a——; well, fill up the hiatus as you like. She's my sister; she's 6 years old; she plays the piano; she sings (I'll back her to yell "Barberry Bush" against any 6-year-old in tidewater Virginia); she wears a blue frock, a stick of candy, and a mud pie; and—she asks questions.

The other morning while I was sitting at the breakfast table eating a slice of toast some one else had toasted, she smole the winning, made-to-order smile with which she prefaces all of her questions, and asked: "Papa, Dip (diminutive for Dell), who wath Nero?"

"Nero was an old Roman who had a tendency for getting hilarious."

"O, yeth, I thee. He wath a muthic teacher, wathent he?"

"No, Nero was not a music teacher. You have probably heard the old story that he fiddled while Rome was burning."

"Yeth, thir. Well, what'd he do?"

"He was put to death, A. D. '68, for attempting to play John Baseler's 'Tuba Polka' on the violin."

"Well, I thay, Dip, who was Vochner?"

"Wagner was a man who wrote 'Parsifal' and 'Baby Mine.'"

"What'd he do?"

"He drank bock beer and dressed in female attire."

"What'd he do that for?"

"Partly because his suspenders were always busting, and partly to have an excuse for crowding a No. 11 foot into a No. 7 shoe."

"Well, what elth did he do?"

"He chewed up bad girls. Once, when he saw a young woman named Materna washing clothes, he grabbed her by the thin part of the neck and exclaimed: 'Gott sei dank, Ich habe Brunnhilde gerfunden.'"

"Anything else?"

"Yeth, thir. Well, I thay, Dip, who wath ——?"

But just then the postman rang and I escaped.—Richmond Baton.

Scene in a County Court.

At Bury St. Edmunds County Court, England, the other day, before Sir Francis Roxburgh, Judge, William Farrow Taylor applied to have an award set aside on the ground that none of the forms of the County Court which would make the award valid had been complied with, and that the reference exceeded his powers.

The Judge described an affidavit made by plaintiff as a tissue of falsehoods from beginning to end.

Mr. Jones, solicitor—I protest against such an observation from the Bench as a most improper one.

The Judge—I am not going to be spoken to in that way, and I fine you £2.

Mr. Jones—All right. Your courts are getting notorious all over the country.

The Judge—I fine you another £2 for that.

Mr. Jones said he would not permit the Judge to use language such as he had used with regard to his client without protest.

The Judge refused the application.

A subscription was opened in Court to pay the fines inflicted on the solicitor.

One of the largest plantations in the South is that of Major B. W. Bellamy, of Jefferson county, Fla. It comprises 8,000 acres and nearly all of it is in cultivation. More than 1,500 negroes are employed on the plantation and the Major knows them all by name.

POTTER PALMER'S QUEER WAY.

How He Discharged a Man for Laziness and Hired Him Again at Higher Wages.

Potter Palmer, the great Chicago hotel man, according to our namesake of that city, will not tolerate laziness in his household. He expects his employees to keep at work while on duty, and nothing irritates him so much as to see one of them shirking his task. The other day while strolling through one of the corridors of his hotel he came upon a young man sitting idly in a window, with a mop and a pail of water beside him. Without appearing to notice the man, Mr. Palmer stopped and gazed thoughtfully out of the window.

"Well, what are you doing here?" he suddenly asked.

The young man started. "I—I have been cleaning the windows," he stammered.

"It strikes me that you are idling away your time," said the hotel proprietor, still gazing out of the window. "You are not paid to sit here and do nothing."

The window-cleaner tried to explain that he had been working very hard and had just sat down to rest a minute, but Mr. Palmer apparently did not hear him.

"When I hire a man to work for me I expect him to work. I will have no idlers about this house. On the whole I don't think you are the kind of man that is needed here, and you may consider your services in this hotel at an end. Go down to the office and draw your pay."

The discharged employee was struck dumb with surprise and he moved off in silence. After changing his working clothes for his best suit he descended to the office and received from the cashier the balance due on his month's wages. He lingered for a few minutes to speak with one of the assistant porters and was just remarking that he was out of employment, when who should come strolling through the rotunda but Mr. Palmer. Perhaps the gentleman overheard the remark. At any rate he paused, looked at the young man a moment, then tapped him on the shoulder and said:

"Come with me. I want to speak with you."

More surprised than ever the young man followed him into his private office. Mr. Palmer, in a kindly tone, asked, "Are you in need of employment:

"Why, yes; I——"

"Would you like to do general work around a hotel—clean windows and that sort of thing? I want just such a fellow as you appear to be."

"Why—why Mr. Palmer, don't you know me? I——"

"Know you? Never saw you before in my life. But that makes no difference. I know what a man is by simply looking at him. You are honest and industrious—I can see that in your face. Now, I just discharged a man for skirking his work—a lazy, shiftless fellow—and I want you to take his place. I am so well pleased with you that I will agree to pay you $20 a month and your living expenses, although I only paid the other fellow $18. You can commence work at once if you like."

By this time the truth was very apparent to the young man and he concluded that he would be very foolish to tell Mr Palmer of his mistake, He therefore permitted himself to be hired to take the place of the "lazy, shiftless fellow," and within an [illegible] he was again at work cleaning windows. At last accounts Mr. Palmer had not heard of his mistake and in all probability is not yet aware that the man he dismissed and the man he afterward employed at better wages are one and the same. The other hotel employees have had a vast deal of fun over the incident.

Tea-Drinking and the Teeth.

Some years since, when on duty at recruiting stations in the north of England, I took observation on the great amount of disease and loss of the teeth existing among the class of men offering themselves. It became a cause of rejection of itself in great numbers. As far as inquiries went I was led to trace it to the excessive tea-drinking indulged in by the working classes in the manufacturing towns, and this went on all through the day, whether with food or not. In fact, instead of 5 o'clock tea being the invention of the upper classes, it was found to exist to an injurious extent in the working classes long before that time. Tea seems to have a peculiar tendency to cause hyperæmia in the tooth sacs, leading to inflammation, and, eventually, abscess of the fang, with, of course, dentralgia at every stage. Whether this special tendency was due to theine or tannin having an elective affinity for dentine it is not possible for me to say. It would be curious to know if medical men, practicing in such manufacturing districts, had observed the deterioration of teeth to be coincident with tea-drinking.—British Medical Journal.

No Hope for Him.

Enraged husband—Maria, I can endure this existence no longer. I am going to blow my brains out!

Wife (calmly)—Don't attempt it, John. You have never had any success in firing at small targets.

Mr. John Jones, of Fairburn, Ga., has a very wonderful house cat, if a tale that is told of it is to be believed. Several weeks ago this cat caught a rat, but, instead of killing it, began to nurse and care for it, and now gives it as much careful attention as any of her kittens receives.

Florida's "wild man" carries an old fashioned flint lock musket, and is so wild that whenever any person comes near him he runs like a wild deer and hides in the dense swamp near by. Evidently he is out of ammunition.

The annual crusade against the barbed-wire fence is about to begin coincidently with the opening of the fishing season. A philosopher who spends his winters hunting alligators in Florida and his summers whipping trout streams in the Adirondacks, has given it as his personal experience that a man may recover from the diphtheria, the mumps, or even the cholera, but he can never get over the barbed-wire fence and remain the creature he once was.

FLESHERTON:
THURSDAY, JUNE 7, 1888.

VOLUME VIII.

Beloved reader! with this issue, THE ADVANCE enters upon the eighth year of its existence. The feeble infant of June 1st, 1881, has grown into the sturdy youngster of June 1st, 1888. The swaddling clothes have long since been discarded for attire more befitting a youngster which has successfully tided over the various "diseases" and "mishaps" incidental to babyhood. In fact, THE ADVANCE is getting to be a big boy now, and its progenitor may be pardoned by the indulgent reader if he pats the promising youth on the back and tells him to continue to "Hew to the mark let the chips fall where they may."

We could not let this opportunity pass without returning our sincere and hearty thanks to our patrons generally for their loyal support in the past; and we trust THE FLESHERTON ADVANCE has merited the continued liberal patronage of its numerous friends in the County of Grey and elsewhere.

We might note several improvements made in connection with THE ADVANCE office during the past year. In the first place, a neat building, of solid brick, was erected for us last fall, into which our well appointed printing plant was removed from the old office about the 15th October last. A solid brick residence was erected for us at the same time adjoining the printing office, which enables us to attend to business at any hour of the day or night. This we have found a great convenience to many of our patrons, who could not get into town during regular business hours. We have also added a first-class fire-proof safe from the celebrated firm of J. & J. Taylor, Toronto, which enables us to afford ample security to those of our customers who occasionally find it necessary to leave important documents with us. For the comfort and convenience of midnight visitors, our arrangements are most complete. Altogether, in fact, our establishment is probably the best equipped village enterprise of its kind in the three northern counties of Ontario, viz., Simcoe, Grey and Bruce.

With these few remarks we close.

Muddy Valley.

Correspondence of The Advance.

I expect when some people read these items from Muddy Valley, they will be asking where under the sun is that place. Well, here it is—its one mile and a quarter north of Boothville --that is one corner of it. The other is about the same distance north of that beautiful place called Swinton Park, and it is three miles straight south of Priceville, where Brander lives. Its no mean place either. They come all the way from Swinton Park to practice a horse that took a prize in Hopeville for trotting on the 24th; and another young man drove from Brownville around this way with his gal on the 24th, "for a near cut" to Hopeville. He did not seem to know he was in Muddy Valley, for he called in a couple of places on the way to make enquiries. So, there! I think I have told you where it is—its large enough for you to see when you get near it.

Mr. Archie Ferguson, who had his leg broken last fall is able to walk around without the aid of crutches. He is engaged by the Paterson firm to sell their agricultural implements. We wish him success.

A few of the young folks in this neighborhood went to Durham on the 24th. They went in pairs as usual, and had a very pleasant time. Some others went fishing and caught a few chubs. Its a great deal easier catching a fish than a boy on the 24th.

Mr. James T. Wilson and Mr. John Moody got badly hurt at Geo. Watson's raising. They were lifting the short splice of the main plate up on the beams, when it slipped and fell, bringing them down and falling across their legs and bruising them badly. No bones broken.

Mr. T. Atchison, of Brownville, is expected home from the States where he has been since last fall. We expect he will give somebody in Muddy Valley a call on the 12th.

Sydney Blakeston is working with Hugh Wilson in the mill. They are rushing business.

Wm. Sacket, who has been working with A. Ferguson, is going to the lakes for the fishing season. We hope he will return safe in the fall.

DEATH OF JAMES FAHEY.

From the Toronto World.

Mr. James Fahey, the best known and cleverest newspaper paragrapher in Canada, died Saturday night at 8 o'clock at his late residence in Lisgar street. Mr. Fahey was ill but two days, an acute attack of pleuro-pneumonia carrying him off in that short period. None of his friends knew of his illness till late on Saturday afternoon, and Mr. H. E. Smallpiece and Mr. J. F. Louden, of The World, barely got to the house in time to see him die. Mr. Fahey was born in Smithville, in the County of Wentworth, about thirty-eight years ago. He leaves a family of seven children in very poor circumstances. Mrs. Fahey only died a little over a year ago,

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vim and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. Lubon's Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

A barn belonging to Mr. McCabe, merchant of Priceville, was completely destroyed by fire on Saturday night last. As the building is some distance from any residence, the fire is supposed to have been the work of an incendiary.

A barn belonging to Mr. James T. Wilson, of Proton, was burned about the same time.

A great many changes are likely to be made this year by the Stationing Committee, in connection with the Guelph Conference. It is currently reported that Rev. Mr. Ottewell will be removed to another field of labor—a fact the many warm friends he has made on this circuit during the past year will regret very much to hear. Rev. Wm. Ottewell is one of those quiet, dignified, stalwart Christians, who form the strongest bulwark in any church. The oftener you come in contact with them the better you like them.

Mr. R. L. Mortimer, Editor of the Shelburne Free Press, visited friends in this neighborhood last week, spending Sunday here.

[Correspondent at Priceville will please send items to ADVANCE office as usual, notwithstanding the visits of the Agricultural Editor. What the A.E. misses the cor. can catch "on the fly," and between the two, Priceville readers ought to be well supplied with news. We expect to visit Priceville at least once every two weeks in future, except during the present month, when we attend conference and take our usual holidays.—ED.]

A correspondent sends us the following additional particulars in reference to the fire losses alluded to above:—

Mr. McCabe's barn contained several farming implements, which were destroyed together with the building. Mr. McCabe has the sympathy of a large number of friends.

Mr. Wilson's barn caught fire while that gentleman was at church. It is supposed that the building took fire from some matches with which one of Mr. Wilson's little children was playing. Loss about $1600. Mr. Wilson has the good will of all his neighbors.

Eugenia.

On Friday, Mrs. Duncan, of Eugenia, who had been prostrated a few days by sickness, quietly passed into her eternal rest. Mrs. Duncan was a young woman in the full vigor and bloom of womanhood but lately weakened by motherhood. By reason of her late severe confinement her death was not unexpected, during the last few days, yet it fell with sadness and gloom on her family and friends. Mrs. Duncan was an excellent young woman and died with bright hopes of a glorious resurrection. Mr. Duncan has the sincere sympathy of the entire neighborhood in his very sad and sorrowful bereavement. The funeral which took place on Sunday to the Methodist cemetery, Flesherton, was largely attended by friends and neighbors who wished to pay their last tribute to the departed friend.

The 24th of May was duly observed as a holiday in and around Eugenia. Although there were no public games or special inducements the romantic scenery is always an attraction for pleasure-seekers and tourists.

A picnic held under the auspices of the Royal Templars of Flesherton visited our town and appeared to enjoy themselves splendidly as Fleshertonians generally do.

Mr. and Mrs. John Bowerman and family have arrived in our village. Mrs. Bowerman and family intend spending the summer here and Mr. Bowerman leaves on Wednesday via Owen Sound for Sault Ste Marie to seek his fortune.

Planting Evergreen Trees.

To the Editor of The Advance.

Sir,—Perhaps you will allow me to remind your readers that the first week in June is the best time to plant evergreens. We are getting throughout the country many beautiful rows of maples planted which add much to its summer beauty, do good service in giving shade, and also by modifying the force of the wind are valuable in preventing the too rapid drying up of the land. But in winter and early spring when much needed as wind-breaks they are not nearly so beneficial as evergreens would be.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers, there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all Druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

Why You Feel

So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best

Spring and Family Medicine

in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how does sell." Prepared by

Luxuriant Hair

Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.

Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.

Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."

A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.

The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

ROYAL MARRIAGE IN BERLIN.

Prince Henry and Princess Irene Wedded on Their Grandmother's Birthday.

EMPEROR FREDERICK A GUEST.

A last (Thursday) night's Berlin cable says: The Court to-day was present at the marriage of Heinrich, the sailor Prince, second son of the Emperor, to Princess Irene, the third daughter of the Grand Duke Ludwig of Hesse, and the lamented Princess Alice, Grand Duchess of Hesse and Princess of England. The bride was born at Darmstadt, July 11th, 1866, and is said to be both amiable and highly educated, and, without being beautiful, is possessed of a very fine figure, and is more than good looking. The bridegroom was born August 14th, 1862, and is regarded as the future admiral of the German navy. He has been in the service since 1879, and has made two voyages around the world. He is generally considered to be the cleverest member of the Hohenzollern family, and in years past, when Prince Wilhelm fell from popular grace through his escapades, the Prussians had hope that fate would assist the younger brother to the Imperial throne.

The betrothal of the illustrious couple was officially made known on the occasion of the 90th birthday of the late Kaiser, and the marriage ceremony was announced to take place in the latter part of February last, but the death of the late, and the serious illness of the present, Emperor delayed the marriage until to-day.

Last evening the special train conveying Princess Irene, her father and their suites and the Prussian officials who had met them at the frontier, steamed into the Charlottenburg station. After the usual greetings had taken place the Crown Prince introduced all the brilliant suites to Princess Irene, and then conducted his future sister-in-law to a carriage. Mourning was abandoned for the occasion, and all the younger princesses appeared in white. Princess Irene, in an open victoria drawn by four black geldings, with outriding postillions, looked beautiful in her ivory white silk pearl. She was completely overcome by the hearty enthusiasm of the reception. Twenty thousand people lined the route, shouting "Hoch!" "Wilkommen!" etc. She was pale, though she smiled occasionally and a tear trickled down her cheek as she neared the palace.

A thousand torches and electric lights reflecting on the cuirassiers' helmets and on the Gardes du Corps were all toned down to a full moon ideal. The bridal reception was in the Blue Salon of the palace. The Prince of Wales and distinguished guests awaited the arrival of the Royal party, who were driven into the courtyard between lines of the Foot Guards. Afterward the bride and bridegroom held a reception in the palace. The park in front was like fairyland, illuminated by electric lights. Among the trees sylphs appeared to be hovering over the happy bride and her cousin, while around the palace the shouts of the enormous crowd brought one back to the realms of reality.

The ceremony took place to-day in the private chapel of Charlottenburg Castle, which was filled with the representatives of royalty, the foreign embassadors and the principal German Ministers. Emperor Frederick, Empress Victoria, Dowager Empress Augusta, the Prince of Wales and the King of Saxony were amongst those present. At noon there was a clangour of all the bells in Berlin and Charlottenburg to announce the commencement of the ceremony, and a salute of 36 guns were fired at half-past 12, to indicate that the bride and bridegroom had exchanged rings

Prince Henry and his bride left by a special train at 3 o'clock for Erdmannsdorf, where they will spend the honeymoon. They received a continuous ovation along the route.

Prince Henry and the Crown Prince wore naval uniforms.

The Emperor, notwithstanding the padded suit specially made for the occasion, showed in his wasted frame the ravages of disease. He was the rose-crowned corpse at the marriage feast.

The Emperor was strongly excited during the ceremony, and Dr. Mackenzie was very anxious for the result. Beyond being much fatigued His Majesty does not appear to have suffered.

Thousands of people were assembled outside the castle. When Gen. Von Moltke arrived he was enthusiastically greeted by the multitude.

The bride wore white peau de sole and Alencon lace, the silk underskirt being flounced with rich lace. The train, of the same material as the dress, was square, and the sides of the skirts were ornamented with orange blossoms.

A last (Friday) night's Berlin cable says: Before the wedding ceremony yesterday the royal family assembled in the blue drawing-room where the Empress affixed the Princess' crown upon the bride's head, using a gold toilet service presented by the Czar Alexander I. to Queen Louisa. Count Stolberg having registered the marriage, the procession started for the chapel. Count Radolinski led, followed by the bridal couple, the Grand Duke of Hesse escorting the Empress, the Prince of Wales escorting the Crown Princess, the Crown Prince escorting Grand Duchess Elizabeth (the wife of Grand Duke Sergius of Russia and sister of the bride), and others.

The floor of the chapel was covered with Persian carpet and the walls were suitably decorated. The Empress stood at the right of the altar and the Grand Duke of Hesse at the left. The dowager Empress, in widow's weeds, was wheeled in from a side door. The couple stepped up to her and kissed her hand, bowing low, the choir in the meantime singing a hymn. Then the Emperor, in the uniform of a grand marshal, walked in erect, with a firm gait and movement. He allowed his eyes to wander over the assembled company, smiling and bowing graciously. Approaching his mother he bowed low and kissed her hand and then seated himself beside the Empress. Altogether it was an impressive and touching scene.

The ceremony now began. Chaplain Koeg delivered an eloquent sermon, in the course of which he referred to the Empress and Queen Victoria. Toward the end of the sermon the Emperor rose, leaning upon his sword, and remained standing during the rest of the ceremony. The choir sang an anthem by Sir Arthur Sullivan.

The bride wore a low-cut corsage trimmed along the edge with large diamonds, and a heavy necklace of gold. She held a fan set with diamonds. Her bosom ornaments, which were diamonds, and her bracelets were all ancient Royal jewels. The Empress was dressed in pale green silk with a plastron of silver brocade and a pale blue silk train. She wore a splendid diadem of diamonds, white feathers, riviere of diamonds on her neck and carried a bouquet of orange blossoms.

Count Herbert Bismarck was present. During the ceremony the Emperor did not cough or show a sign of discomfort or weakness. Dr. Mackenzie was near at hand and kept a watchful eye upon him. The Castle of Augustenbery at Kiel has been prepared for the residence of the couple after the honeymoon.

WOOED AND WON BY POST.

How a Toronto Beau Captured a Cleveland Belle.

A last (Friday) night's Cleveland despatch says: One of those cases so often read of but so seldom actual fact occurred on Huron street in this city yesterday. It was a marriage brought about through correspondence. The circumstances are said to be as follows: In Toronto lives William Young, a matter-of-fact young man, who some time since took it into his head to get married. He was not romantic, and the Toronto girls appear not to have fully come up to his requirements. At any rate, through some means or other, he learned the address of Miss Nellie Meffert, a young lady living on Huron street, in this city, and learning that she was open to a matrimonial alliance he wrote to her asking her to correspond with him and detailing the amount of his worldly possessions, his personal appearance, etc. The fair Cleveland lass responded affably and after a few interchanges of letters photographs were exchanged. Both were well pleased with the likenesses. After about two months of epistolary courtship the young man formally proposed for her hand. She accepted, and he wrote that he would arrive here last Wednesday to claim his bride. There was considerable nervousness in the house on Huron street. The prospective bride wondered if her lover had sent her a genuine likeness, if he had deceived her as to his age, and if he would still stick to his bargain after he had seen her. At last the prosaic wooer arrived and knocked at the door, asked if Miss Meffert lived there and was informed that she did. He then announced in a purely business way that he had dropped in to marry her. The young lady flew to meet him, and they exchanged greetings and looked each other over. The young man was satisfied with his share of the bargain, but the young lady was not quite so considerate. She dallied with him for some time and it began to look as if Mr. Young would go back to Toronto a bachelor. At last Miss Meffert relented and the young couple were united in matrimony last evening. They left the city this morning for their home in Toronto.

Baby Bit the Baby.

A New Haven (Conn.) despatch says: A strange incident, which may cause the death of a little child, was witnessed yesterday in a prominent dry goods store in this city. Mrs. North, of the western part of the city, was shopping, taking her infant of about 16 months with her. While she was making her purchases she placed the little girl on a revolving stool. Near by was a German woman, who had a child about the same age, that began to coo and manifest a desire for a closer acquaintance with the North baby.

The German woman lifted her child up close to the other, saying, "Kiss the baby." The little German then embraced the North baby, but, instead of kissing her, bit her cheek frightfully, causing the blood to flow and the cheek to puff and swell badly. Mrs. North thinks that the child will be disfigured as long as it lives, if the injury extends no further, and it is very ill to-day from the effects of the bite.

The German woman was so mortified that she at once left with her child, and her identity could not be discovered.

Nineteenth Century Magic.

The fact, I think, deserves to be recorded for the edification of future generations that in this present year of grace 1888 the corporation of Tiverton, being anxious to procure a new water supply for the borough, engaged a respectable soothsayer from a neighboring town to discover by means of his divining rod the most likely spot on which to sink a well! I am not joking. This performance was actually gone through a mile or two from Tiverton on Wednesday last. The sorcerer or medium, or whatever he is to be called, was a Mr. Lawrence. He was accompanied in his search by a party of aldermen and town councillors. The divining rod became duly agitated in a number of places—so much so that, says the reporter, it "occasionally almost prostrated the manipulator with exhaustion." The result is accepted by the foremost intellects in Tiverton without demur. Two wells are to be sunk at once and the contract is already placed. Good heavens!—London Truth.

A Shower of Hats.

For several hours the other day it literally rained straw hats in several towns in Norfolk County, Mass., and next day weather vanes, church steeples and other architectural peaks were decorated with them. The explanation is that a small tornado struck the Excelsior straw works in Medfield at about midday, and several hundred straw hats which were out drying were swept up by a funnel-shaped cloud, which carried them out of sight in a twinkling. Next day the hats were picked up in Walpole, Foxboro, Sloughton, Mansfield and other places within a circle of more than ten miles in diameter. The tornado was strong enough to pick up from the bleach yard of the factory a large number of Canton hats, weighing as much as ten pounds apiece. These were whisked up in the air fully one hundred feet. The storm came without warning and disappeared as suddenly.

A lady physician, Dr. Hattie Allen, has been appointed Associate Professor of Medicine in the University of Michigan. "Now," says the Medical Record, "we hope Hattie will write herself Harriet."

FARMER KREITMEYER'S LUCK.

After a Romantic Career He falls Heir to a Baroncy and Great Wealth.

An Economy (Pa.) despatch says: Emil Kreitmeyer, a middle-aged man, employed here for some time past as a farm laborer, to-day electrified the Communistic Society of Economites, in whose employ he has been, with the startling announcement that his real name is Von Kreitmeyer, and that he has just come into possession of the title of baron and a vast estate in Oberamt Maulbronn, Kingdom of Wurtemberg, Germany.

MARRIED THE GAME-KEEPER'S DAUGHTER.

Emil Von Kreitmeyer is the second son of the tenth baron of the same name. He was born on his father's estates in the German Province above named forty-eight years ago. Before reaching his majority he fell desperately in love with Wilhelmina Freibertszeiser, the daughter of his father's game-keeper—a bright-eyed, rosy cheeked, buxom girl of 17—whom at length he clandestinely wedded. When the concealment of this secret marriage was no longer possible the wrath of Emil's father knew no bounds. He pronounced anathema maranatha upon his son for having disgraced his family by a mesalliance with a peasant girl, turned him out of doors and forbade him ever again cross the threshold of the Von Kreitmeyer halls. Thus cast off by his father and "cut" by all his aristocratic friends, young Kreitmeyer pluckily resolved to take his young wife over the sea and endeavor to earn a comfortable living for her by the labor of his hands in the New World. During the voyage she presented him with a son and heir, but both mother and child died and were buried at sea.

JOINING THE UNION ARMY.

Meanwhile the guns of Fort Sumter were booming, and when Kreitmeyer landed at New York he found that city ablaze with excitement, while brave men jostled each other in their eagerness to enroll themselves among the volunteers for whom President Lincoln had called. Having been destined by his father for the army, Kreitmeyer promptly enlisted in a New York regiment. At the first battle of Bull Run he was carried off the field with a Confederate bullet in his breast, and for long weeks afterward he was confined in a Washington hospital. When sufficiently recovered to leave it he returned to his regiment and served gallantly until the very end of the war. He was again twice wounded, and one bullet, which a rebel sharpshooter contrived to lodge in his head, continues there to the present day.

REVISITING HIS NATIVE LAND.

When mustered out of service after Lee's surrender, Kreitmeyer, having led an abstemious life and carefully saved his pay, found himself the possessor of some $600, and with this sum he determined to recross the water and pay a visit incognito to the neighborhood of his old home. On arriving in Oberamt Maulbronn he wended his way to the lodge in the forest on his father's estates, whence he had led his young bride in the long ago. Making himself known to his father-in-law, the old gamekeeper, he learned from him that both his parents were dead and that his elder brother was now master of the title and estates. Completely overcome and softened by the news of his mother's death, Kreitmeyer sought a reconciliation with his father, but the new Baron declared that he could never forgive the disgrace which Emil had inflicted upon the family name by his marriage with the gamekeeper's daughter, and, following the example of his father, he anathematized the returned soldier and turned him out for the second time.

Feeling utterly friendless and alone in the world, Kreitmeyer enlisted in the Prussian army and continued in the service for a period of fifteen years, during which time he passed unharmed through both the Austro-Prussian and Franco-Prussian wars, though on more than one occasion his horse was shot under him. He left the army in 1880, resolved to return to the United States; but his second visit to this country was not so fortunate as his first. After wandering about for some time from city to city, turning his hand to any odd jobs he could obtain, he at length drifted to this communistic settlement and obtained employment as a farm laborer, in which capacity he has continued for several years.

THE HAPPY ENDING.

Some three or four months ago he answered an advertisement in a German newspaper for information concerning Emil Von Kreitmeyer, heir to the barony and estates of Von Kreitmeyer, in Oberamt Maulbronn, Wurtemburg, Germany—the last incumbent, Emil's brother, having died.

Considerable correspondence passed on the subject, and yesterday Kreitmeyer received a letter with a German postmark from the family solicitors, enclosing a draft on New York for a sum sufficient to supply all his wants and enable him to travel like a gentleman to Oberamt Maulbroon, where his title and estates await him.

Mr. Spurgeon on the Baptist Union.

A London cable says: The Calvinist Methodists have, perhaps, an idea that it is possible to annex Mr. Spurgeon to their denomination, and they have been passing a vote of sympathy with him in his present ecclesiastical troubles. He replies in a remarkable letter, "mourning," he says, "over a great evil in some of the churches. I sacrifice peace, friendship and repute to be clear of it. My protest was resented and judged to be needless." But he considers that the discussions have more than justified his charges, and repudiates again the compact which was made without his concurrence. He then adds: "It has cost me many wounds and much dishonor to have been the accuser of my brethren. It is still more painful to find their great errors not regarded as serious by the mass of professors. My only course is to follow a separate path; not, however, separating myself from any of any denomination who hold the faith once delivered to the saints." That is Mr. Spurgeon's way of saying that the Calvinist Methodist who agrees with him is a better Christian than the Baptist who follows the "down grade" with the Baptist Union. Wider than ever, therefore, is the breach between the Baptists and their great preacher.

An Oregon boy recently killed a companion for answering in Sunday-School a question on which he himself had failed.

Crew of a Wrecked Vessel Attacked by Chinese Pirates on the High Seas—Desperate Resistance—The Ship Fired.

A last (Thursday) night's San Francisco despatch says: The steamer City of Peking, which arrived from Hong Kong and Yokohama yesterday, brings additional information in regard to the wrecking of the steamer San Pablo, near Turnabout Island, in the Channel of Formosa, a month ago. The captain's statement is as follows: On Monday evening the vessel ran into a thick fog. He kept the ship on her course, though precautions were taken to keep continually sounding. On Tuesday morning at 3.30 the San Pablo struck a sunken rock ten miles north of Turnabout. It was impossible to back the ship off, as the two holds and coal bunkers were filled with water and there was danger of the vessel capsizing. It was decided that it was hopeless to attempt to save the steamer or cargo, consequently the passengers and crew took to the boats and made for Turnabout Lighthouse, whence they were conveyed to Shanghai. Just before the lifeboats were ready to be lowered a swarm of Chinese piratical junks came from the neighboring mainland. The queer-looking vessels sailed in line of battle, and Capt. Reed, realizing the danger his charges were in, made preparation to repel the attack. The pirates, however, came in such overwhelming numbers that before any demonstration could be made on board the sinking vessel they were climbing up the ship's sides. They were led by a man armed with a cutlass and a large revolver. His shipmates were also very heavily armed. Capt. Reed passed revolvers and guns among the passengers and crew and after a furious fusillade the Coolies were beaten off. They rallied, however, and made a second and more desperate attempt to board the San Pablo, which was fast settling in the water. Some of the pirates gained the main deck in spite of the gallant stand of the passengers and crew and were swarming toward the promenade deck, where the defenders were busy firing and reloading, when Capt. Reed brought the ship's hose pipes into requisition. The long coils of hose were manned by the crew and instantly the pirates were again put to flight, the torrents of boiling water from the pipes sweeping many of them off the decks into the sea. The Coolies then beat a retreat, and drawing their vessels up in line cruised half a mile off the sinking vessel with the evident intention of waiting for its abandonment. During the fight Capt. Reed imprisoned all the Chinese among his crew with the Chinese passengers in the forehold, for fear they would aid their countrymen. As soon as possible the passengers, mail and specie were put into the San Pablo's boats, and then all bore away for land. When only a short distance from the wreck they saw the pirates set sail and rush upon the San Pablo. They clambered over the ship's sides with grappling hooks and were soon masters of one of the finest boats that ever sailed the Pacific. Whether by accident or design, they soon set fire to the ship, and when last seen smoke was pouring from the wreck in great clouds. In a few days tugs were sent to the relief of the San Pablo, but they found only the hulk, burned to the outer edge and stripped of everything valuable. It is estimated that at least a score of pirates lost their lives in the fight with Capt. Reed and his men. During the battle the women and children who were rooms, where they were sought the statenot only of falling into the hands of the pirates, but of being drowned in the water which was filling the ship.

The "I-Would-Not-Live-Alway" Life Insurance Co.

The old style life insurance companies are extremely careful in assuming risks, and to this end, besides subjecting applicants to a most rigid medical examination they, in addition, carefully inquire into the habits, appearance and fighting weight of his forefathers and foremothers, his uncles, his cousins and his aunts, on a still hunt for the germs of hereditary disease. In addition, they refuse risks where applicants pursue an avocation which they regard as hazardous.

This works an injustice to many which my company, recently organized, seeks to remedy by an ingenious classification which is to regulate as follows:

First, we have the usual premium for healthy persons, based on age at time of insuring, then we add to this premium a graded increased percentage according to the symptoms of hereditary disease apparent in the assured or their relatives and the hazardous nature of their occupation. We absolutely exclude all those whose pursuits in life are fairly certain to entail sudden death sooner or later. This additional assessment system is graded as follows, the percentage being based on accurate mortuary statistics:

Those having symptoms of or liability to inherit heart disease, dropsy, insanity, jim-jams, Bright's disease, scrofula, consumption, etc., 10 to 20 per cent.

Those actually afflicted with these diseases (or any of them) 20 to 50 per cent., according to severity of attack.

Occupation premiums—Brakemen, conductors and engineers, 15 per cent. extra.

Spring poets, 75 per cent. extra.

Murderers awaiting trial (if poor and friendless) 95 per cent. of amount of policy.

.B.—Murderers awaiting trial, (if rich or with influential friends, will be charged an additional premium.)

Professional baseball players, 50 per cent. extra premium.

Umpires of baseball games, 100 per cent. extra.

Miners, seamen and river navigators, 33 1-3 per cent. extra.

Aeronauts and trapeze performers, 100 per cent. extra.

House builders and submarine divers, 50 per cent. extra.

House servants who start fires with kerosene, 100 per cent. extra.

Employees of gunpowder or dynamite works, 500 per cent. extra.

Painters and steeple climbers, 300 per cent. extra.

Texas horse thieves and Mississippi editors are not taken at any rate whatever.

Thus hazardous occupations get a show, while we exclude the two classes whose way leads to certain and sudden death.

WIDDOWS' RECORD.

The Remarkable Career of a Religious Impostor.

DOINGS IN CANADA AND ELSEWHERE.

Our despatches a few days ago contained an account of the trial, conviction and sentence of "Rev." Francis George Widdows and Charles Hart Burleigh, described as a clerk in holy orders, for shocking acts of indecency with pupils of Christ Church Hospital, London. The Judge, it is learned by mail, addressing Burleigh, said he could find no mitigating circumstances, and sentenced him to ten years' penal servitude on one charge and penal servitude for life on the other charge. The prisoner fell back in a swoon. Widdows was sentenced to ten years' penal servitude.

The career of Francis George Widdows, who is falsely described as an "ex-Franciscan Monk," and who has now been committed for ten years on a disgraceful charge, is sketched in the Norwich Argus. Norwich is Widdows' birthplace, and a gentleman there has kept track of his career as a religious philanthropist, who has devoted his life to exposing Romanism. fant Samuel was due on Father Ignatius' stage. The monastery was broken up after four years. Young Nobbs or Widdows then proceeded to London. He dressed himself as a priest, and travelled with a companion similarly attired. He called himself Brother Aloysius, and his companion Brother Stanislaus. Brother Aloysius was next heard of in his native town as the centre of attraction in the Marylebone Police Court. The charge was similar to the one for which he has now been sentenced, but he escaped punishment through the failure of the prosecuting witness to appear. He then went to Rome, to France and to Canada, where he began his life work. Seeking ever those localities where fanaticism was most rampant, he was able to find people to listen to him in many places, and the extent to which he deluded his sympathisers would be amusing were it not for the peculiar moral depravity of the chief actor. In the midst of his Canadian career he was arrested in Toronto, tried, convicted, and sentenced to prison for two years. After leaving prison he returned to England, went to Glasgow to lecture and to Dundee. In a few days he converted the latter town into a first-class bedlam. The average Dundee citizen is a man of strong convictions, and while the mob did not know exactly what they would do with Mr. Nobbs, they earnestly beseeched to be allowed to get at him. One evening, while he was lecturing, the angry citizens surrounded the hall, and he had to don female attire and escape over the roofs adjoining the hall. The Dundee Advertiser thereupon took an interest in Nobbs' career, and sent to Toronto for all the documents pertaining to his conviction, which they duly published. Nevertheless Nobbs went back to Norwich, drove about the city in an open carriage displaying a life-size portrait of himself which his Dundee flock had caused to be painted. The most singular thing about his career is that he has always found people of the fanatical temperament to believe in him, and his Dundee following look upon him as a martyr, and made up a purse for him. With this money he went away, and afterwards turned up in Liverpool and other towns, and then went to London and began lecturing at Hackney. At Hackney he called himself a "Martin Luther man," build him a chapel, sympathizers there to Martin Luther Chapel, and now the congregation have been deprived of their pastor.

Ladies Looking at a Battle.

On a lovely spring Sunday some months ago some English ladies in Suakin mounted to the housetops and witnessed a thrilling spectacle. In the clear atmosphere every movement was visible on the sandy plain behind the town, across which Osman Digna's horsemen, poising their long spears and with terrific yells, charged furiously, while the Egyptian troops, drawn up in battle array, pour volley after volley into the turbaned hosts. Shells from the gunboats in the harbor hissed over the heads of the ladies and plunged into the mass of advancing Arabs. The charge was as desperate as the furious rushes at Abu Klea, and the tremendous fire that emptied many a saddle did not daunt the fanatical courage of the desert warriors. Then the ladies saw on the yellow sand a fierce hand to hand fight, soldiers who were defending themselves pierced with spears, a wavering of the charging line, and finally the slow retreat of the enemy, who carried their dead and wounded from the field as they sullenly retired. There was not a tree or a house to hide a single detail or to impair the vividness of that Sunday morning spectacle. It cost over 200 lives, and it was one of those rare occasions when non-combatants are able to see, spread out before them as on a stage, the carnage and all the realities of battle.

A Mother's Sacrifice.

At Bristol, on Wednesday, an inquest was held on the body of Emily Hunt, wife of a tailor. She was preparing her husband's supper, when a paraffin lamp fell to the floor and exploded close to the cradle containing her infant child, and the flames set fire to the pillow. The deceased seized the infant, and her own clothes then took fire; but she ran with the child to the further corner of the room, laid the child down, and then fell near the door. When the neighbors came to her assistance the mother was dead, her body being terribly burned.

"My little boy is wonderfully polite,' said a doting mother the other day. And yet it is recorded of the very polite little boy that he left a lady caller standing in the hall of his mother's home one day while he went the rounds of the house and grounds yelling at the top of his voice: "Mother, mother, where be you? where be you, I say? The new minister's wife i here and I forgot to tell her you wan' home."—Kingston Freeman.

When a Wife's a Go'n' Away.

Somehow yarns around the groc'ry
Ain't so funny as before,
An I'm all the time forgettin'
This or that 'ere little chore;
When I git out in the kitchen,
Want to hang around an' stay;
Guess I'm foolish caus' this ev'nin'
Why—my wife's a go'n' away.

She's a fixin' things up for me
With a thoughtful, lovin' care,
Tellin' me that somethin's here,
An' somethin' else is over there;
Lookin' sober, speakin' low-voiced,
Though she hasn't much to say;
Ketch her eyes on me all dim like—
Guess she hates to go away.

Wish 'twas over—wish 'twas way off—
Wish we didn't have to part;
That's jist what I keep a thinkin',
An' afeelin' in my heart.
P'raps our speerits see much furder
Than the partin' of to-day,
An' jest hint what they can't tell us,
When a loved one's go'n' away.

Calls to mind another journey,
By-an'-bye we all must go.
Wonder who's a gettin' ready
For the train that moves so slow?
Brings the tears to think about it,
So I git nigh her an' pray
It may be my time for startin'
Jest when she's a go'n' away.

Waiting.

When over hedge green and blossoms yellow
The sunlight throws a shadow dark and long;
When birds skim low across the daisied meadow
And still the mellow cadence of their song—

When breezes lightly lift the nodding clover,
And whisper in the swaying of the leaves;
When rosy clouds are hazy o'er the hill-top,
And evening for the dying daylight grieves—

Then do I listen for my loved one's coming,
My heart wild beating as the moments pass;
Then do I watch and wait in silent longing
To hear his footsteps on the dewy grass.

Then does the small boy saunter up the roadway,
A letter waiving as he nears the gate;
Then do I read the same old chestnut message,
"Detained again—will not be home till late."

Gettin' Nigh to Town.

I'm a thinkin' of the cabin
Where our honeymoon begun;
Where I landed tired and hungry,
When my workin'day was done.
Oh! I felt so kinder rested.
When, a comin' near, I'd see
Your dear face was at the winder,
Waitin', watchin' out for me.

But ole Time has took the cabin,
An' a town is on our claim;
But, in spite of all the changes,
My heart loves the place the same;
For the light is still a shinin
An' though old, as others see,
The loved face, still at the winder,
Seems as good, more dear to me.

Like a trav'ler late an' weary,
I'm a gittin' nigh to town,
All the lights a sunnin' brighter,
In the night a comin' down,
An' they flash upon the river,
Like a beckonin' angel hand,
An' upon the bank a waitin'
I can see the boatman stand.
Soon I'll be a crossin' over,
An' I'm ready when I see
The dear face there at the winder,
That has allus watched for me.

Asthma a Symptom.

Asthma is not a disease per se as is popularly supposed, but a symptom of disease. It is spoken of by different names—as, for instance, hay asthma, rose or June asthma, and ipecac asthma. Some people will get asthma from sleeping on a feather pillow; others as soon as they come in contact with certain animals, as a dog, a cat, or a squirrel. Professor Austin Flints cannot sleep on a feather pillow without getting asthma, and so susceptible is he to it that they are placed under his pillow by persons whose design it is to catch him on his theory. Cases have come to notice where the asthmatic symptom was developed in men who happened to get hold of a blanket upon which a dog had been sleeping the previous day. Asthma may be a symptom of emphysema of the lungs, and may last for weeks or even months. Two men who were treated by me, one having nasal polypus and the other stone in the bladder; both had asthma. To persons susceptible to it asthma is developed from working in the dust around thrashing machines, and others suffer from it as soon as they enter an apothecary's shop where ipecac is kept. Nor is dropsy anything but a symptom of disease or a result of it. Defined, generally, asthma is a manifestation of disease of the nervous system which causes contraction of the bronchial tubes. It may be seen as a spasmodic contraction of the nerves, and of course may be a symptom of heart disease or some other disease.—Dr. B. F. Steinmetz in Globe-Democrat.

A Peculiarity of American Eyes.

The efforts of the War Department to secure a field glass of greater power than the one now in use has discovered the fact that the eyes of Americans are closer together than those of men in foreign countries. The double glass, known as the field glass now used is weaker than that used in the armies of Europe. It is only from five to six powers—entirely too weak for the purpose. The only glass that can be got of sufficient power is a single spy glass, which is defective in that it does not take in a broad enough field. This is a very serious defect in the equipment of the American army, but there seems to be no immediate prospect of its correction, because our eyes are too close together. Some of the colored troops may be able to use a different glass, but the white Yankee soldier cannot overcome this national peculiarity. The best military field glass in use is that with which the German army is supplied. An attempt was made by the War Department to adopt it, but it was found that the eyes of the glasses were so far apart they could not be used by Americans.—Washington Letter to Philadelphia Ledger.

Why the Right Arm Is Used Most.

A delicately-perfumed note was received at this office a few days ago from a young lady of Lancaster, in which she satisfactorily explains the conundrum about the use of the right hand. She says: "The heart is on the left side, therefore the right hand is its almost exclusive use to prevent too great action on the left side, for more than the usual exercise might injure that organ of the human body. The left arm of man, to which woman naturally clings, is nearest to his heart, leaving his right arm free for her defence in a case of necessity."—Charleston News.

BLACKMAIL IN SARATOGA.

Experience of a Gentleman Who "Came Down" and Got Out.

There have been recently—indeed, when are there not?—some cases of attempted blackmail here, and apropos the following story was recently told. A gentleman who was staying at a hotel in Saratoga was one morning passing down a corridor which led from his room, when a lady who stood in the door of her room accosted him:

"I beg your pardon," she said, "but can you tell me the time?"

He looked at her and judged her to be a respectable and inoffensive person.

"It is 10.30," he replied, consulting his watch.

The woman turned back into her chamber, but instantly wheeled about again.

"I am very sorry to trouble you," she said, "but my clock is stopped and I do not know how to set it. I have an important engagement in about an hour, and I shall be extremely obliged if you will set it for me."

The gentleman kindly and rashly acceded to her request and stepped into the chamber. On the mantel stood an ordinary travelling clock. He went up to it, took out his watch again and laid it on the shelf while he proceeded to set the clock. The lady followed him and picked up the timepiece.

"What a beautiful watch," she said.

"Yes," he answered, turning away from the clock. "It is an heirloom."

"I think," the woman observed, "that I will keep this watch."

And as she spoke she showed him in the other hand the key of the door, which she had noiselessly closed and locked. He looked at her a moment in silence.

"Very well," he said, holding out his hand for the key.

She tucked the watch into the bosom of her gown and gave him the key, smiling serenely. He opened the door and then turned back.

"Upon second thought," he said, with unruffled coolness, "I think I will redeem the watch. It is an heirloom and I am fond of it."

"Yes?" she responded.

"I will give you $50 for it," he said, taking out his pocketbook.

"Very well," replied the adventuress, producing the watch.

He gave her the money, took the watch and departed a poorer, but possibly a wiser man.

When this tale was recited at the club the gentleman who told it related it as an adventure which had befallen a friend of his. When he ended some one asked:

"But why in the name of common sense didn't he ring the bell or kick up a row?"

"He knew better," responded the narrator, with a smile. "He was locked into a chamber with a daring and abandoned woman, who would have fought to the last gasp. It was worth more than $50 to him to escape the scandal."

"That is all very well," observed another club man, "but if he had looked the baggage in the face and calmly ejaculated, 'Oh, rats!' she would have come down quickly enough."

Which may be true. I am not an expert in such matters, but it does on the whole seem probable that most men who get blackmailed are either victims of foolish cowardice or are conscious that there is that in their past records which makes it wise for them to [illegible]—Providence Journal.

How Long a Child Should Sleep.

A healthy baby for the first two months or so spends most of its time asleep. After that a baby should have at least two hours of sleep in the forenoon and one in the afternoon, and it is quite possible to teach almost any infant to adopt this as a regular habit. Even to the age of 4 or 5 years a child should have one hour of sleep, or at least rest in bed, before its dinner, and it should be put to bed at 6 or 7 in the evening and left undisturbed for twelve or fourteen hours. Up to the 15th year most young people require ten hours, and till the 20th year nine hours. After that age every one finds out how much he or she requires, though as a general rule at least six to eight hours are necessary. Eight hours' sleep will prevent more nervous derangement in women than any medicines can cure. During growth there must be ample sleep if the brain is to develop to its full extent, and the more nervous, excitable or precocious a child is the longer sleep should it get if its intellectual progress is not to come to a premature standstill or its life be cut short at an early age.—Dr. C. F. Pollock in the Chautauquan.

How the Burmese Feed.

The Burman is a rather peculiar feeder, not being very nice in his selection or preparation of food. He is not, however, so varied a caterer, nor does he take in such a large selection, as his near relation, the Chinaman. The Burman draws the line at rats and mice, which delicacies form no portion of his daily fare. He is forbidden by his religion to shed the blood of any animal for food purposes alone, although he may and does catch fish, and eats them. His conscience finds a salve in the fact that after the fish are caught they are left to die; he will not bleed them, although he may often give them a sly knock on the head to accelerate their decease. He may keep cattle, hogs, chickens, etc., and, being of a kind and humane disposition, he feeds them well, keeping them in good condition, but he does not do so to replenish his larder. He uses the milk of the cows, often of the tame long-horned buffalo or of goats, for his family or for sale; he will also eat the eggs of fowls.—San Francisco Chronicle.

An interesting report of the death of a native was recently made by a coroner's jury in India. The native had had the misfortune to meet a tiger, and the report says: "Pondu died of the tiger eating him. There was no other cause of death. Nothing was left of Pondu save some fingers, which probably belonged either to the right or left hand."

STORY OF THE SHIRT.

A Garment That Has Grown Steadily Into Popular Favor.

The shirt began to assert itself in the 14th century, says the San Francisco Chronicle. For many years it was kept carefully concealed by the outer garments from the general public, partly from innate modesty and partly because it would not bear inspection. While the outer garments were worn long the shirt had a corresponding length. When they were shortened, displaying the full length of the nether limbs, the shirt assumed a corresponding brevity. Before this period there had been a suggestion of it about the neck, where it was revealed by an ornamental band. Now a part of it began to be pulled out between the doublet and the long hose, at about the locality where the modern vest intersects the pantaloons. Similar displays of the garment are still seen among persons of low degree, but they are generally the result of accident. Sometimes the gallant whose shirt was not of the requisite fineness allowed a part of a handkerchief to supply the place. Then the sleeves of the doublet were slashed to show the shirt, which had to be, at least at the exposed places, of very fine material. During all this period it will be remarked, the desire to show the shirt came from the fear of the wearer that there was a latent suspicion in the minds of others that he lacked that garment. This logic applies with equal force to the contemporary handkerchief, one corner of which peeps in a neat and convincing way out of the dude's breast pocket. During the time of Louis XIII., Louis XIV., Cromwell and the Charleses, the shirt stopped over in the form of an enormous turndown collar that took a variety of shape and ornament. On the beginning of the eighteenth century, it may be said literally to have come to the surface. The doublet had gone out, and the waistcoat, a luminous garment, had come in. It descended nearly to the knees, and being only fastened by a few loops or buttons about the waist, displayed all the shirt that could be decently exposed to the public gaze. Men then, it will be seen, wore the corsage low. Before the end of the century the lower part of it had disappeared, the open part had contracted, and it had assumed nearly the dimensions of what in America we call the vest. A little later the shirt went out of sight entirely under the manipulation of the Paris incroyables and the English beaux, buried beneath a mountain of cravat, over which the wearer, by elongating his neck, was just able to regard passing events. Since then it has been at the mercy of fickle fashion. There are those who think that starched shirt-fronts and false collars have been worn ever since the flood. This is pure fantasy. Shirts only began to be starched about fifty years ago, and the custom did not at once become general. As to false collars, which with present style of coat permit a man to wear the same shirt as long as did a dude or baron of the middle ages by carefully keeping to the leeward of his auditors, they did not make their appearance till long afterward.

An Elephant Funeral.

The following letter from a planter in Ceylon ment[illegible] an incident—the [illegible] of the body of a dead elephant by its comrades of the herd: "I went after a herd of eight elephants, and [illegible] up with them about 3 p.m. After stalking I got a chance at the one which seemed about the biggest of the herd, and dropped it at the first shot. It turned out to be a big cow elephant. About two hours afterward I had the tail and feet cut off and taken to the bungalow. Next morning I went to the spot to look at the elephant and found her, or what remained of her, non est. After looking around I saw the herd had been around during the night, and I soon discovered a track where they seemed to have retired in a body. I followed this up through a thick bamboo jungle, and, about 500 yards further on, I came upon the dead elephant lying in the bottom of a rocky stream. Judging from appearance, the body of the elephant had been carried to the top of the bank, and from there rolled into the stream. From the tracks it was quite evident that the body had not been rolled, but carried to the bank, and it was plain that it had been rolled through the managrass, which grows on the sides, into the stream. The jungle through which the body was brought to the stream was very heavy with bamboos growing close, and the track which the elephants made was several yards wide. Some surprise was expressed at the circumstance to my neighbors till I showed them where the elephant had been shot and where its tail and feet had been cut off and where the body lay in the stream, which proved conclusively that by some means or other the body had got over the intervening space in the night. It is difficult to understand how elephants with their trunks and feet could raise and support the dead body of a comrade. However, they seem to have managed to do it."

The will of a French advocate contains the following bequest: "I give 100,000 francs to the local madhouse. I got this money out of those who passed their lives in litigation; in bequeathing it for the use of lunatics I only make restitution," which to say the least of it, was rather rough on his clients.

Sure enough, the tank was soon removed, a flower piece substituted, and the guests began eating the fish that had been swimming about.

WARNER'S SAFE CURE.

ST. CATHARINES, Ont., Jan. 24, 1887.—About six years ago I was a great sufferer from kidney disease, and was in misery all the while. I hardly had strength enough to walk straight and was ashamed to go on the street. The pains across my back were almost unbearable, and I was unable to find relief, even temporarily. I began the use of "Warner's Safe Cure," and inside of one week I found relief, and after taking eight bottles I was completely cured.

H. E. Lussey

TORONTO (18 Division Street), Sept. 17, 1887.—Three years ago last August my daughter was taken ill with Bright's disease of the kidneys. The best medical skill in the city was tasked to the utmost, but to no purpose. She was racked with convulsions for forty-eight hours. Our doctor did his best, and went away saying the case was hopeless. After she came out of the convulsions, she was very weak and all her hair fell out. The doctor had left us about a month when I concluded to try "Warner's Safe Cure," and after having taken six bottles along with several bottles of "Warner's Safe Pills," I saw a decided change for the better in her condition. After taking twenty-five bottles there was a complete cure. My daughter has now a splendid head of hair and weighs more than she ever did before.

Mrs Jos Emmo

THE GREATEST BLOOD PURIFIER.

CHATHAM, Ont., March 6, 1888.—In 1884 I was completely run down. I suffered most severe pains in my back and kidneys, so severe that at times I would almost be prostrated. A loss of ambition, a great desire to urinate, without the ability of so doing, coming from me as it were in drops. The urine was of a peculiar color and contained considerable foreign matter. I became satisfied that my kidneys were in a congested state and that I was running down rapidly. Finally I concluded to try "Warner's Safe Cure," and in forty-eight hours after I had taken the remedy I voided urine that was as black as ink, containing quantities of mucus, pus and gravel. I continued, and it was not many hours before my urine was of a natural straw color, although it contained considerable sediment. The pains in my kidneys subsided as I continued the use of the remedy, and it was but a short time before I was completely relieved. My urine was normal and I can truthfully say that I was cured.

J. W. Woods

296 MacNab street north, HAMILTON, Can., Nov 2, 1886.—I had been suffering for over twenty years from a pain in the back and one side of the head, and indigestion. I could eat scarcely anything, and everything I ate disagreed with me. I was attended by physicians who examined me and stated that I had enlargement of the liver, and that it was impossible to cure me. They also stated that I was suffering from heart disease, inflammation of the bladder, kidney disease, bronchitis and catarrh, and that it was impossible for me to live. They attended me for three weeks without making any improvement in my condition. I commenced taking "Warner's Safe Cure" and "Warner's Safe Pills," acting strictly up to directions as to diet, and took thirty-six bottles, and have had the best of health ever since. My regular weight used to be 180 pounds. When I commenced "Warner's Safe Cure" I only weighed 140 pounds. I now weigh 210 pounds.

REGULATES EVERY BODILY FUNCTION

GALT, Ont., Jan. 27, 1887.—For about five years previous to two years ago last October, I was troubled with kidney and liver trouble, and finally I was confined to my bed and suffered the most excruciating pain, and for two weeks' time I did not know whether I was dead or alive. My physicians said I had enlargement of the liver, though they gave me only temporary relief. Hearing of the wonderful cures of "Warner's Safe Cure" I began its use, and after I had taken two bottles I noticed a change for the better. The pains disappeared, and my whole system seemed to feel the benefit of the remedy. I have continued taking "Warner's Safe Cure" and no other medicine since.

I consider the remedy a great boon, and if ever feel out of sorts "Warner's Safe Cure fixes me all right. I weigh twenty pounds heavier now than ever before.

THE NEXT POPE.

A Forecast Regarding the Successor of Leo XIII.—He Must be Another Italian.

Signor di Cesare has prepared a revised edition of his well-known work, "Il Conclave di Leone XIII.," comprising a new second part in which, according to an article in the current number of Italia, this able and well-informed writer discusses very freely the delicate question of the probable choice of the future conclave. If a new Pope had to be selected now it is considered certain that he would be an Italian. The nation which next in order would have the best chance is France, where Cardinals Petra and Lavigiere have conspicuous pretensions; but a French Pope would arouse the most determined opposition, not only from Italy and Germany, but also in present circumstances from Austria and Hungary, and very likely from the English cardinals. As regards the latter, the objections are purely personal. "Newman," it is observed, "is 87 years old; Manning, who has lost of late some of the harsh dogmatism of the neophyte, and who would be inclined to reconcile the independence of the Papal See with the necessity for Italy of having Rome, is 80; and Howard is very ill." None of the Spanish, Portuguese and American cardinals will, it is considered, be able to exercise any considerable influence. Moreover, the Italian cardinals exceed in number all those of other nations in the proportion of 35 to 29, and it is expected that the next cardinal will also be Italian. It is believed that the very dissension now existing between the Roman Curia and the Italian Government will help the election of some one of these, as this is a guarantee that the one chosen will not be a subservient ally or a partisan of his national Government.—London Standard.

Adulterated Spices.

She was a wee maiden of three summers, accustomed to the simplicity of the nursery table, and with a taste unvitiated by the use of spices. She was allowed the other day to come to the family table, where she was especially interested in the mystery of the pepper-box, an article which had apparently never before come within the limits of her observation. She watched with close attention while her papa peppered something, and then with the utmost gravity and politeness she extended her plate, saying: "Please put a little dirt on mine, too, papa!"

Home Testimony.

Many hundred recommendations similar in character to the one given below have been received and give proof of the great value of Polson's NERVILINE as a pain remedy. Try it.

ATHOL, Feb. 20.—We hereby certify that we have used Nerviline in our families, and have found it a most reliable remedy for cramps in the stomach, also for headache, and externally for rheumatic pains. No house should be without this invaluable remedy.—LUKE COLE, ELISHA COLE, J. P.

A fair applicant for a teacher's position in Clinton County, Mich., said the days are longer in summer than in winter because heat expands and cold contracts.

A Woman's Charms

soon leave her, when she becomes a victim to any one of the various disorders and peculiar "weaknesses" that are peculiar to the fair sex. The condition of tens of thousands of women to-day is pitiable in the extreme; they are weak, bloodless creatures, a prey to mental anguish and bodily pain; in a word, "broken down," from any one of numerous causes. To this unhappy multitude we strongly urge the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, an infallible, world-famed remedy, for all "female" irregularities and "weaknesses," and which restores the worst sufferer to vigorous health, and reinvests her with all the charms of figure, face and complexion, that receive such willing homage from man.

An Apt Pupil.

Ambitious mamma—Edith, I noticed last night that Mr. DeRich paid you considerable attention—I hope you showed him a proper amount of civility.

Ingenuous debutante—Oh, yes, mamma, I did! I'm sure he knows he can have me for the asking.

It Is Not Unlawful.

Congress has enacted no law to restrain a person from going about in a badly constipated condition, or with a distressing sick headache, rush of blood to the head, bad taste in the mouth, bilious complaint, or any kindred difficulty; but the laws of health and comfort will suggest to any one so afflicted, the wisdom of hastening to the nearest druggist for a 25-cent vial of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets—the most potent of remedies for all disorders of the liver, stomach and bowels. Purely vegetable, pleasant to take, and perfectly harmless.

A St. Louis minister says that the greatest feat of baptism in the history of the Baptist Church in modern times was that performed in July, 1878, by J. C. Clough, a missionary, who, with the assistance of five native preachers, immersed 2,222 converted brethren within six hours.

Mr. Daniel Wright, a prominent resident of Collingwood township, died at his late residence, on Saturday, 26th May, aged 68 years. Mr. Wright was born in Glasgow, Scotland, and came to Canada when a young man. He taught school many years and was a resident of the township 25 years. He had held the positions of Councillor, Deputy-Reeve and Reeve respectively for several years, and was a prominent member of the Grange. He was a devoted member of the New Church (Swedenborgian) and a man of strict honor and integrity of character. "In him," says the Thornbury Standard, "has passed away one of our most revered and respected land-marks."

Last Sunday afternoon within the village precincts two of our citizens who were in Mr. Doyle's bush sitting down in a thicket of poplars smoking their pipes, were surprised to hear shots whizzing around their heads. On rising up they confronted two local sports who were firing at marks near the poplars. Shooting at any time within the village is a dangerous practice as has been signified on more than one occasion, but on Sunday, when our citizens are all free from work and taking their ease in secluded places it is even more dangerous—yea, even more so than horse racing.—[Dundalk Herald.

Runaways.

On Wednesday last, Mr. John Adams left his horses and wagon to which they were hitched standing at the roller mill while he went to the village to transact some business but before he got past Heard's carriage shop he saw his horses coming behind him at full speed. They passed him but were stopped opposite Elder's livery stable before any damage was done.

Mr. Will Heard and Frank Sullivan started for Markdale on Friday afternoon last with a horse and covered buggy. They were raising the cover nearly opposite Hawk's egg pickling establishment when the horse took fright and made a leap breaking the cross-bar of the buggy and throwing the occupants out. The horse got free from the buggy and ran to the top of the hill opposite Mr. R. Lever's where it stopped. The buggy was slightly damaged. Will escaped injury but Frank got a bruise on the leg which made him use a walking stick.

"A DOUGLAS! A DOUGLAS!"

The Scion of a Noble Scottish House Jailed for Annoying a High Horn Dame—An Eccentric Daredevil Family.

A London cable says: London society is finding time even amid the Derby distractions to talk about the latest aristocratic scandal, and the talk will become fast and furious when the newspapers announce the direful news of the imprisonment of a real live nobleman. A couple of years ago Lord James Douglas, of the noble house of Queensberry, met Mabel, the daughter of Lady Scott, and was pleased to fall in love with the young lady, who was still in her teens and a ward of Chancery, or, what is considered more probable, with the money to which she would become entitled when of age. His love was not reciprocated, but Lord James declined to take his dismissal as a gentleman should and began a course of systematic annoyance of the lady, whose mother was finally compelled to evoke the all-powerful protection of the Court of Chancery against His Lordship's persecution. The Court sharply reprimanded the ungentlemanly lover and solemnly warned him he would be sent to prison should he attempt to hold any communication with Miss Mabel. Lord James' friends persuaded him to go on a long yachting tour in the Mediterranean, hoping that absence and time would bring him to his senses. He went to the Mediterranean, but continued to brood over his dismissal, and finally decided to defy the Court of Chancery. The defiance took the form of an indecent photograph which he posted to Miss Scott. At Christmas he once more thought of the loved one, and he made her aware of his continued existence and remembrance by sending her an indelicate card. The lady's relatives fretted and fumed, but Lord James kept out of the country until last week. Then the powers of the Court of Chancery were for a second time invoked. The counsel for the noble culprit humbly apologized in his behalf, but Justice Chitty was stern. The former leniency, said his judicial Lordship, had been thrown away, and he ordered Lord James to be committed to prison for contempt, adding, as though frightened at his own audacity in sending a peer to jail, that he would entertain a plea for the defendant's release in a fortnight. After his capture society gloated over the scandal, but fretted somewhat at seeing one of themselves in prison garb. Lady Florence Dixie, the defendant's sister, wrote a passionate letter to the newspapers, protesting that her brother was not the blackguard which the evidence clearly proved him to be, asserting that in his dealings with women he was chivalrous in the extreme, and that the Christmas card of which so much had been made was not at all indelicate. No one else came to Lord James' rescue. The court hardened its heart, and the Chancery Tipstaff, with Justice Chitty's warrant in his pocket, prowled around the west end until last night, when he bagged his game. His Lordship was good enough to offer no resistance. He was hustled into a cab, and is now meditating within the gloomy walls of Holloway Jail. The living members of the Queensberry family are, to put it mildly, somewhat eccentric. The present Marquis is an avowed freethinker, a famous amateur boxer and a dare-devil steeplechase rider. He used to sit in the House of Lords as the Scotch representative peer, but some years ago his peers, shocked by his public avowals of scepticism, refused to re-elect him. His next brother became a Roman Catholic, and is now a monk laboring among the very poor of this great city. His third brother is Lord James and his sister is Lady Florence Dixie, an equally dare-devil steeplechaser, a world-wide traveller and writer, and the friend and advocate of Cetywayo, the black King of Zululand, who was treated so infamously by the British Government and died of a broken heart in consequence.

DOCTOR TORN BY A DOG.

Terrible Fight with an Angry Brute and Fears for the Result.

A Boston, Mass., despatch says: Dr. George W. Galvin was attacked and badly bitten on Saturday evening last by a bull mastiff, under circumstances most peculiar. Together with Dr. Dixon, of Bertston street, he was called to attend Mrs. Hurd, of No. 61 Beach street. It was found expedient to etherize her, and during the operation a bull mastiff, which had been sleeping quietly in a corner of the room, made a spring for the doctor. In the wrist of the faithful physician the infuriated beast fastened his fangs and a terrible tussle ensued. Over the floor they rolled until the angered beast, whose head had been in chancery, managed to fasten his teeth in the thigh of the physician. The dog clung with the tenacity of his breed until Dr. Dixon, the associate of Dr. Galvin, having performed his duties at the bedside, came to the assistance of his confrere and together they strangled the dog to death.

Dr. Galvin at once proceeded to his office in the United States Hotel and summoned Dr. Watts, who cauterized the wounds in the wrist and thigh. Dr. Galvin's wounds are painful, and he is in fear of the dreadful consequences that may result.

Extraordinary Loss of a Husband

A Montreal despatch says: Mrs. James Elliott, of Three Rivers, and lately of Waterbury, N.H., reported at the Central station this morning that whilst passing through here on her way to Three Rivers she lost her husband in St. Dominique street in a most extraordinary manner. It appears that he was foreman for Messrs. Hall, Neilson & Co., lumber merchants, of Three Rivers, for 32 years. Wishing to retire from work he moved to Waterbury, but there became weak-minded, and desired to go back to his place of birth. On arriving here he desired to see some relatives in St. Catharine street, but on the way up St. Dominique street he felt weak and sat down on a doorstep. His wife walked on a few steps, and when she turned to look for him he had disappeared. Thinking that perhaps he had gone to Three Rivers she went there, but failed to find him and returned.

"It is pretty blue up at the house," said Mr. Twiney, mournfully; "I have got a cold, my wife's got a cold, baby's got the measles, and my eldest daughter's got a piano. Which is the warmest park to sleep in?"

MARITIME BANK FAILURE.

Startling Revelations Made in Court—The Manager Believed to Have Kept Two Sets of Books—Nearly a Million and a Half of a Deficit.

A St. John, N. B., despatch says: Some startling facts relative to the defunct Maritime Bank have leaked out lately in connection with the trial of the Bank of Nova Scotia vs. Harrison. A short time prior to the failure, Mr. A. A. Sterling, of Fredericton, who had been a director in the bank, sold out a large portion of his stock in that concern to Mr. W. F. Harrison, a St. John merchant, accepting the latter's note therefor. The note was deposited in the Bank of Nova Scotia, and when the time expired for payment Mr. Harrison refused to meet it, alleging Mr. Sterling was aware of the rottenness of the Maritime Bank when he sold the shares. The trial of the case has resulted in a thorough exposure of the loose methods adopted by the bank management, and some of the evidence elicited gives rise to the suspicion that MacLellan keeps two sets of certain books so as to hide the true state of the bank affairs from the directors. Mr. Sterling swears that although he was a director and attended a meeting at the bank on July 29th, 1886, he did not know that R. A. & J. Stewart had then drawn exchange on Stewart Bros., London, to the extent of over £40,000. The bulk of this exchange was without an endorser. Neither did he know that MacLellan, the manager of the bank, had surrendered $75,000 worth of Guy, Bevan & Co.'s securities and accepted instead certificates of stock in the Trading Company to the extent of £15,000. It has also been shown in evidence that although the Trading Company had a large amount to its credit in the bank when it failed, the bulk of it came from the Stewart Exchange and was really the bank's own money.

Mr. J. F. McMillan, one of the liquidator's clerks, swore to-day that the deficiency of the bank, after deducting the value of assets, was over $1,300,000. The liquidators had realized nothing from Stewart or from Guy, Bevan & Co. From George McLeod, who owed $168,000 when the bank closed, they had got $4,000 and a promise of a little more.

The revelations are not calculated to inspire much hope in the breasts of noteholders. MacLellan, who is largely responsible for the crash, is said to be operating in real estate in Omaha.

"Truth" on the Emperor Frederick.

A London cable says: Mr. Labouchere says: It is scarcely to be wondered at, but is none the less to be regretted, that the present interlude in the Charlottenburg tragedy should once more be giving hopes for which there is unfortunately not a shade of foundation. It may be true that Prof. Virchow has found no cancerous elements in the matters which he lately examined. But this negative evidence proves nothing whatever in such a case. The statement that the learned professor has now given a positively favorable opinion is simply incredible, except on the supposition that his brain has undergone some kind of sympathetic mummification during his recent exploits as an archæological resurrectionist in Egypt. Another statement which was made not long ago with some pretence of authority, was that the disease from which the German Emperor is suffering is now believed to be consumption of the throat, which is absolutely idiotic. Certain other theories of amateur diagnosticians which have been widely current in a sotto voce kind of way, and which need not be more particularly referred to, are equally groundless. The truth is that there has been little or no doubt all along among the doctors as to the nature of the disease. But as by the Prussian Constitution no one suffering from a malady declared to be incurable can ascend the throne, it was necessary for them to dissemble.

A Real Aerolite Captured.

A Cleveland, Ohio, despatch says: As Mr. I. N. McMullen was enjoying his vesper smoke last evening in his house yard on Seelye avenue, his attention was arrested by a blazing object in the sky shooting his way. He called to his wife to step out and see it, and as she responded to the call an aerolite imbedded itself in the ground within ten feet of where he stood. When it struck, the mass of fire resolved itself into a ball as large as a football and burned for a few seconds. The atmosphere was filled with a strong sulphurous odor. For a moment Mr. McMullen was struck dumb with amazement and terror, but on recovering he hastened to the spot where the mass had fallen. He found a hole in the ground from which a considerable amount of heat issued. Resolved at all hazards to find out what had entered the ground, he procured a light, and seizing a small hatchet, dug down for a distance of two feet, when he found a substance about as large as a small apple too hot to handle. He threw it out on the ground to cool, which took about half an hour.

After being sufficiently cooled to handle he took it into the house and proceeded to examine it. It is a half sphere in shape, weighs about 12 ounces, and has the appearance of being copper coated with a thin black substance. It is so hard that a sharp knife will not cut it.

Ingersoll's Reply to Gladstone.

A New York despatch says: The Herald prints advance extracts from Col. Robert Ingersoll's article in the forthcoming North American Review in reply to Mr. Gladstone's defence of Christianity. Col. Ingersoll opens his article with a courteous compliment to Mr. Gladstone, saying: "Most men are chilled and narrowed by the snows of age; their thoughts are darkened by the approach of night. But you, for many years, have hastened toward the light, and your mind has been an 'autumn that grew the more by reaping.'" The article is a bold declaration in advocacy of freedom of thought and rejection of superstition.

"Why are you like a crazy man, my dear?" asked a wife, seating herself beside her husband. "Don't know," replied the husband, "I give it up." "Why," replied the wife, hitching close up to him, and putting on one of her sweetest smiles, "I am your other self, and you are beside yourself."

A BRIDE'S SUICIDE.

Her Summary Manner of Getting Rid of a Drunken Husband.

A Carthage, Ill., despatch says: At Fountain Green, twelve miles east of Carthage, Mrs. Ida M. Wright, the young bride of Silas M. Wright, was found hanging in the smoke-house yesterday evening by her husband, who had been absent from home since Monday. The deed was committed on Tuesday. Upon discovering the body the horrified husband fainted away and lay in a stupor for several hours. The body was cut down by neighbors and the following letter was found on her person:

DEAR HUSBAND,—It is my pleasure that I write these few lines. I am as happy as can be, and I hope you are the same. I am going to hang myself to-day and I know you will be happy. I wouldn't leave you, but I never could be happy. Bury me in my wedding clothes. I hope you will jump and sing for joy when you see me hanging by the neck. This is Tuesday morning. At 5 or 6 30 my troubles shall be ended in this world. I wish you all the joy in this world, for I am as happy as can be. I haven't cried or shed a tear since you left, for I was too happy to cry. I am going to die believing in the Lord. I will be happier than to live with a drunkard.—Your wife, IDA M. WRIGHT.

Wright had come home drunk on one or two occasions and his conduct drove the woman to suicide.

A Model Minister.

Rev. Dr. Rainsford, rector of St. George's Church, New York, is six feet tall, stalwart, healthy and fearless. He says what he means and means what he says, even though he hurts the millionaire and "miserable sinner" (vide "the General Confession" in the Prayer Book), J. Pierpont Morgan. His people have just completed a church building for use of various departments—schools, workingmen's guilds, St. Andrew's Brotherhood, etc.—which, like the barns of Pennsylvania farmers, is bigger than the church itself. On Sunday evenings the working people are in a majority of the congregation (which is always full), though the magnificent ecclesiastical structure stands on Stuyvesant square. Last Sunday Dr. Rainsford took the breath away from some of his people by saying that as his wealthy parishioners were about to go away for the summer, he would be glad if they would allow his poor and needy parishioners to live in their vacant houses. He guaranteed that their premises would be well cared for, and said he would be personally responsible for the conduct of such families as he might furnish the names for occupancy. Whether there has been any general response as yet no one knows, but the experiment is a bold one, and the result will be watched with interest. So far each is waiting to see what his neighbor will do about it. —Ex.

A Husband Stabbed and Wife Insulted

A Windsor despatch says: At Comber, Essex county, on Thursday afternoon, Mr. and Mrs. Adam Fenner went to the post-office. Mrs. Fenner was there accosted by a man unknown to her who insisted on going home with her. When the fellow saw Mr. Fenner approaching he moved on, but kept only a few feet in advance, and when Mr. Fenner approached the man turned around, drew a knife and told him to clear out, at the same time trying to stab him with the knife. The two clinched and a scuffle ensued. Mr. Fenner had his right hand broken and received a stab on the back of the head and one on the shoulder, besides other smaller cuts. The back of his coat and collar were pierced thirteen times with the knife. The ruffian succeeded in getting away and ran across the fields, leaving his hat behind. Constable Lindsay, from the description given by Mrs. Fenner, arrested Louis Dove, an employee of Ainslie's mill. Mrs. Fenner identified him as the man and he was remanded to Sandwich for trial. Mr. Fenner is dangerously wounded.

Clever Exposure of Spiritualistic Tricks

Hermann, the necromancer, entertained a large audience at the Academy of Music, New York, the other evening, by exposing the tricks of the spiritualists' trade. Among other things he disclosed the secret of spook painting by spiritual agency, as performed so successfully by Mme. Diss Debar. Canvasses were shown to the audience to be perfectly blank; then a committee of one was selected to hold it above his head with his back to the audience. The Professor passed his hands several times over the canvass, adroitly removing a sheet of paper pasted over it, turned it round to the audience, and there was a picture. One of these was actually one of those taken away from the studio at Lawyer Marsh's "Temple." Dr. Lawrence, late the associate of the Diss Debar, examined it and said the paint was not wet, as though it had been recently done. Prof. Hermann admitted that the gentleman might know more about how the fraud was committed than he did. "I only know," he added, raising his voice, "that some person in New York has been defrauded of more than $100,000 by just such a trick as this."

A Suggestion to Ticklish Subjects.

A correspondent in "Science" writes as follows: I was a very ticklish youngster, and my comrades sometimes used that weakness for their own amusement. One boy used to show how little effect tickling had upon him; but one hot summer day, as he was lying reading, I tickled him on the ribs, and he almost went into convulsions. I found that he was far more sensitive than any boy in the company, and he revealed his secret to me under condition of my never telling any one else. By holding his breath he became pachydermatous, and would let anybody tickle him as much as they pleased; but of course they always gave it up at once when they saw his stolid look. I tried the plan, and it worked admirably; and it is my only protection, even unto this day, for my cuticle is as sensative as ever. The deduction is simple: a man holds his breath and the tickler is baffled.

"Ironing" for Neuralgic Pains.

Neuralgic pains are a common affliction of humanity, and not a few people would be glad to know that one of the speediest sources of temporary relief is to heat a flatiron, put a double fold of flannel on the painful part and then move the iron gently to and fro on the flannels. "Iron" the painful part thus for a few minutes and the suffering will almost certainly cease.

The Emperor of Brazil continues to improve, and it is proposed to remove him to Aix-les-Bains next Thursday.

WHAT A BLIND MAN CAN DO.

He Can Run a Store Without Help and Without Making a Mistake.

While in the employ of the New Jersey Southern Railroad, a few years ago, Charles H. Fennimore, of Farmingdale, had the misfortune to lose the sight of one eye, the result of getting a hot cinder from the locomotive in it. About a year afterward, while working in a marl pit at Lower Squankum, he got a small pebble in the other eye. He was taken to an infirmary in New York, where every effort was made to save the sight, but he finally became totally blind.

Revolving in his mind various projects for the support of his family, he determined to try keeping a country store. His friends endeavored to dissuade him from the undertaking, but he was resolute and opened a small store in Lower Squankum, three miles from Farmingdale. He soon showed an aptitude for the business, and accomplished things which seemed marvellous. His dwelling house is over a mile distant from his store. At first his little daughter regularly took him by the hand at morning and evening and conducted him to and from his occupation. A little later he said he could go alone, and has done so ever since. His method is to count the steps from the front of his house to his store, and he has experienced no difficulty in reaching both in safety. He locks and unlocks the door and opens and closes the shutters without assistance. His son sweeps out and dusts the store, but he expects soon to do this without assistance. His sense of touch and memory are simply wonderful. Every sort of goods put up in packages is so arranged under his direction that he can deal out anything in his stock that is called for. This he does by counting the steps from either end of the counter, and the number of shelves, beginning with number one at the bottom, and enumerating dividing spaces from either end of the rows of shelving. He weighs accurately anything from a quarter of a pound of tea to 25 pounds of flour, being guided by touch in arranging the weights and the tipping of the scales. His memory of voices is so sensitive that he has never been known to make a mistake in a person's name. As a test a stranger to him was sent to the store. He was a fair mimic, and endeavored to personate a man well known to Mr. Fennimore. He signally failed, the blind storekeeper interrupted him at once and saying: "I don't know who you are, but you are not George Brower."

Perhaps Mr. Fennimore's greatest evidence of an unfaltering and accurate memory is the facility with which he makes change. Every morning Mrs. Fennimore arranges his wallet for him. The $5 notes are placed in the bottom, and $2 notes in the middle, and the $1 notes on the top of the package. He always knows to a penny how much change he has in an ordinary shot bag, and can tell the instant he touches any piece the value it represents. Thus equipped, he is ready to give a customer change for a note or silver currency, and his accuracy in making change equals that of any merchant in all the country round. Tried one day with a $5 gold piece, which was placed in his hand, he looked toward the owner as if he could see him, smiled, rang the coin upon the counter, and said: "This is a $5 gold piece; what do you wish to buy?" He is an expert at addition and subtraction, readily keeping in his mind a dozen articles and their price, and telling the customer the amount the moment the last article is served. He is pleased with his occupation, and has made his business a modest success.—New York Sun.

Deep Breathing.

(By William Blaikie.)

Nobody teaches American boys how to breathe. City boys, and many from the country, too, have finer chests before they go to school than they ever do afterward. Sitting in a school-room, or shop, or factory, or any other room five or six hours a day, and then sitting most of the rest of the day besides, does much to weaken the chest, for when you sit still you do not breathe your lungs half full. Take one large full breath now, and see how your chest rises and expands, and how differently from a minute ago, when breathing only as you generally do. Many boys actually do not breathe their lungs full once in a whole week. Is it any wonder they have weak chests, and that they easily catch cold? How are you to have strong lungs if you do not use them? Which has the strong arms—the invalid leaving a sick bed or the blacksmith? he who uses his arms or he who does not? When walking at the rate of four miles an hour, you breathe nearly five times as much air as when you are sitting still. Now the fuller breaths you take, and the more of them you take in a day, the stronger and fuller chest you are going to have. If every boy in the United States would take a thousand slow, very deep breaths every day from now on throughout his life, it would almost double our vigor and effectiveness as a nation. For deep breathing not only enlarges the chest itself, and makes it shapely and strong, but it gives power and vigor to the lungs and heart, and makes them do their work far better. And it does the same to the stomach and bowels, the liver and kidneys; indeed, to all the vital organs. It makes the blood richer. It adds directly to the vigor of the brain as well, and so enables it to do more work. In short, it is about the best known way of getting and keeping health. And who would care to hire a sick man to work for him? Or who can do much hard work when he is sick? Not that we can always avoid sickness, but it is less likely to come, and has harder work to enter, when we are robust and in good training than when we are weak and run down.—Harper's Young People.

A Ducal Dancer.

The Duke of Sutherland is conceded to be the best dancer of the Highland fling in all Scotland. He recently dined with the Duke of Edinburgh on board the flagship Alexander, at Malta, and after dinner the two dukes danced the "Tullochgorum" for an hour, to the delight of the officers and ship's company. The Duke of Sutherland's piper furnished the music.

"I'll do the best I can, sir," said the new convert humbly to the good pastor, "but you mustn't expect too much of me at first; I've been an auctioneer for the last twelve years."—Chicago Tribune.

THE POOR IN CHINA.

Most of Them Live on Five Cents a Day—Cheap Food and Little of It.

In America, when the laboring man and his family cannot afford to eat meat twice each day, they are supposed to be in a condition of destitution. Yet the Chinese laborer, getting what he calls good wages, does not eat a pound of meat in a month, although meat is as cheap in China as in America. His daily food consists of rice steamed, cabbage boiled in a great deal of water, and as a relish, raw turnip pickled, but in a strong brine, of which he has only two or three bits the size of dice. When he wishes to be very extravagant, and is reckless of expense, he buys a cash worth of the dried seeds of the watermelon, and munches them as a desert. In summer he eats cucumbers raw, skin, prickles, and all, or melons, not wasting the rind, or, it may be, a raw carrot or turnip. His clothing is as simple as his diet. In the summer it consists of shoes and stockings, both made of cotton cloth, and a pair of trousers, without lining, of the same material. He has also a sort of shirt worn outside the trousers, but this he wears only on state occasions. For spring and autumn he wears, if he can afford it, garments of the same material lined. In the winter, in a climate like New York or Philadelphia, his trousers are wadded and his upper garment is either also wadded or is a sheepskin tanned with the wool on and worn with the wool next his skin. He scorns underclothing of every sort. One suit answers for day and night, since he sleeps in the same clothes in which he works. Hence he is not troubled with much baggage when he goes on a journey. Three dollars would probably buy the entire summer wardrobe of what may be called a comfortably poor Chinaman—that is, one at work on steady wages—while twenty-five or thirty cents would be more than sufficient to purchase all the rags—and he wears nothing else—of the very poor. In the winter he always pawns his summer clothes and in the same way entrusts his winter clothing as soon as warm weather comes to the keeping of his "uncle." His house is built of either sundried or "broken" brick laid in mud, has never any other than a brick, or, more commonly, a mud floor, windows of paper, and a door sufficiently open for all purposes of ventilation. For a family of five or six persons there is seldom, if ever, more than one room. The entire furniture consists of a table, a ricketty stool or two, and a raised platform of brick covered with a coarse mat of reeds, which serves as a bed. The house has no chimney and no fire is used, winter or summer, except the small amount needed for the family cooking. The character of the food consumed in such a family has already been described, but something ought to be said as to its cost. It is a very common picture in Pekin or any other city in China to see a little boy or girl going with a few cash and two or three rude and cheap dishes to purchase the materials for an evening meal, and the average cost of such a meal as has been described, for one person, is certainly not more than two cents of our money. I am convinced by many years' residence among the Chinese and careful study of their habits and life that probably two-thirds of the entire population, or say 200,000,000 of the people, live on a food consumption not exceeding $1.50 of our money a month, or say five cents a day.—Youths' Companion.

A Matter of Business.

Judge—It appears from the evidence that you swindled this man out of $23.30.

Prisoner—I admit it, Your Honor, but I beg to call Your Honor's attention to the fact that it was simply in the way of business.

Judge—In the way of business?

Prisoner—Yes, Your Honor. We have formed a Swindling Trust.

Judge—A Swindling Trust?

Prisoner—Yes, Your Honor. I will explain to you. Formerly we used to swindle a man out of $500. Now we swindle ten men out of $50 a piece. Our profits are the same, but we relieve the individual and distribute the burden, putting it lightly upon the shoulders of ten instead of heavily upon one.

Judge—I perceive.

Prisoner—So, you see, by forming a Swindling Trust we are really benefactors of our fellowman; the many come to the rescue of the one. It is harder work, of course, to find ten men with $50 than one with $500, but we have the satisfaction of knowing that we have put the burden of the one upon the many. Moreover, we have broken up all other combinations of swindlers and the community is safe from every one excepting ourselves. I therefore ask Your Honor to look upon the matter in a business light. We are a trust, and as such we look not for interference, but protection from the law.

Judge—Of course, if you call yourselves a trust—

Prisoner—We are, Your Honor.

Judge—Organized for the benefit—

Prisoner—Of the individual, Your Honor.

Judge—Yes, and as you are the individual and society is the many—six months in the House of Correction. Mr. Clerk, call the next case.—Boston Courier.

A Vigorous Warning.

"In Hamilton, Canada," remarks a United States contemporary, "the other day a man was sent to prison for a year for stealing an umbrella, and a careful investigation convinces us that it wasn't much of an umbrella either. It behooves the newspapers of this country to raise a tremendous cry of warning. It would be the hardest kind of luck if some of our bright, enterprising American citizens should get out of this country with a couple of hundred thousand dollars of other people's money with their usual success only to find themselves pining away in an ill-smelling Canada prison at last for stealing an umbrella! Sound the alarm at once! Ring the fire bells, if necessary.

King Oscar, of Sweden, recently called on the Pope, and instead of kissing his hand, as is the custom, kissed him soundly on both cheeks, to the surprise of the courtiers. It was the greatest shock the traditions of the Vatican had received since General Grant shook hands with Pius IX., and said: "How do you do, sir?"

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

Are We Going Back to the Fashions of Eighty Years Ago?

MADE HEALTHY BY A NEEDLE.

Frolics in Fashions, Seasonable Recipes, and Feminine Personals.

(Cousin Kate's Weekly Budget.)

New, Yet Old.

How changeful is fashion! How capricious and exacting! When we think it taken up with such or such a shape and color it is already weary of it, and disdains it for some fresh favorite. A year ago we peaked our bodices, making them as tight and long-waisted as possible; this year all this is completely modified, the queens of fashion—those who take the lead in matters of taste—have discarded pointed bodices and wear plain, straight skirts. This tendency toward a return to the fashions of the First Empire is becoming more and more marked, and will soon be accepted by many. Shall we arrive at the end of the century dressed like our great-grandmothers?

Nor are these century-old fashions devoid of charm. Though we do not approve of them entirely in all their details, on the whole we like them well enough. For one thing, they are certainly more economical than the double or treble draped skirts, for which such yards and yards of material were required. What more simple or convenient to wear than the plain skirt slightly puffed up at the back, and the dainty Reçamier bodice, draped in the shape of a fichu, and fitted round the waist with a wide scarf tied on the left side or fastened at the back into a baby-bow?

Such dresses are not, as yet, very generally worn, but we proclaim them as the coming novelty of the season for young ladies. As a transition between the peaked and the short-waisted bodice, many dresses are being made just now with the fronts plaited slantways, and crossed at the waist under a deep belt, the plain space in the middle being filled up with a plastron of faille or surah.

A pretty model of this style is of absinthe-green cashmere; the fronts are plaited and crossed at the waist, showing a plastron of dark green velvet, finished by a turned-up collar, trimmed with a beaded galloon. The deep belt is trimmed with the same as well as the bands, on to which are gathered the full cashmere sleeves, which do not come down below the elbow. Plain cashmere skirt falling over a silk underskirt of the same color, with small pink-out ruche showing just beyond the edge.

Absinthe-green, the favorite color this spring, is a very soft, grayish shade of green, exceedingly becoming to blondes. Serpent-green madeira and oak-brown are also fashionable colors, and appear in the light, soft woolen materials of the season. Glace surah shot of two colors is combined with these woolen tissues in spring costumes. When tastefully selected such combinations are extremely elegant.

Shot silks are very much in vogue; taffetas, faille and surah are all in the glace style, soft, dullish shades being preferred. Narrow stripes in the pompadour style, pekin, fancy velvet and French faille are also among the silk tissues most in favor.

Morning dresses are made with a plaited blouse bodice confined round the waist by a wide sash tied in front or at the side. The skirt is simply plaited all round, and just puffed up a little at the back. The material is cashmere or veiling. The bodice is often plaited on to a small shoulder-piece of silk or velvet. The sleeves are full, and gathered on to a band to match the shoulder-piece.

Empire Coats.

Now that the hideous coach coat, otherwise known as the Shaker or Dutch robe, has run its length, fashion is ready to examine the directoire or dinner coat, which is all the style in London and Rome. The cut is very similar to the gentleman's evening coat, and is to be seen in a modified style on the stage. Double-breasted, with a deep rolling collar, the waist in front is cut off at the belt while the back gores or tails fall almost to the floor. For morning wear, made in black or dark colors, the garment is double-breasted and secured with a few very beautiful buttons, but the coat designed for the drawing-room opens on a lace vest and frills finish the collar and sleeves. The garment is intended for the few figures that are best relieved by straight lines, and for this class only the richest material is used. The skirts that go with these handsome coats are made of bengaline or India silk, tissues shot with embroidery designs, lace crepe or ribbon effects. An ideal dinner dress is described as being made of Boulanger red skirts, over which was a directoire coat of black moire with long frills of lace at the wrists and a jabot of point lace falling from the throat. With the fancy a large hat is prescribed, trimmed with long plumes. Another swell coat is the pompadour brought out by an English firm and designed exclusively as a dinner novelty for a fine figure. Pompadour brocade makes the coat, which is cut very like a man's coat, the front having revers that roll back to show a sort of waistcoat of velvet overlaid or draped with a jabot of white lace. A couple of buttons mark the waist line in the back, and cuffs of velvet and ruffles of lace finish the sleeve. The pompadour tea-jacket, which is also English, is an immense success. It is composed of the new texture called satin plush in an ecru shade of yellow and fits loosely in front but very tight in the back, closing invisibly. A guard's collar and flat-band wristlets complete the bodice, which in plain colors is elaborately embroidered in gold or silver. One thing is certain, if the dress reformers make any headway these coats will hardly be tolerated, since the corsets are doomed, without which a fit is impossible.

A Great Needle Story.

"Talk about your needle stories," said a man on the streets yesterday, "but I can tell you one that discounts them all, and I don't have to go far from home for the facts, either. My wife's sister, a young lady about 19, has a pet needle. She wouldn't do without it for the world. About three years ago the needle made its first appearance by sticking its point out of her shoulder. How it ever got into her body, or how long it had been there, she says she doesn't know. It didn't come out far enough for any one to get hold of, but went back in, and in about a month it stuck its nose out away down on her right ankle. Then it disappeared again, and it has been scooting around inside of her system ever since, poking its point out about every month somewhere or other. She had it pulled out once with a pair of nippers, and you may not believe it, but it is a fact, she became almost alarmingly ill with a sort of nervous prostration that the doctors couldn't make anything of. "One day an irresistible impulse seized her, as she says, to get that needle and jab it into herself. She did so, and felt much better instantly. The needle has been on his travels without interruption ever since, and she has had perfect health. She couldn't be pursuaded now to have it taken out. About a year ago the needle made its appearance at her left wrist, and the location of both ends of it was clearly discernible. By way of amusement, I suppose, she managed to get at the head of her pet and slipped a little piece of fine, bright red silk through the eye, and now the needle is carrying that all over her system, and once in a while it is discernible beneath the skin. When the needle was out it was very strongly magnetized. Yes, it's a very queer case, and I don't pretend to explain it, but I know the story is true."

Seasonable Recipes.

Rhubarb Jam.—To every one pound of rhubarb allow one pound of loaf sugar and the rind of half a lemon. Wipe the rhubarb perfectly dry, string it and weigh it; put it into a preserving pan, with sugar in the above proportion. Mince the lemon rind very finely, add it to the other ingredients, and place the preserving pan by the side of the fire; keep stirring to prevent the rhubarb from burning, and when the sugar is well dissolved put the pan more over the fire, and let the jam boil for three-quarters of an hour, taking care to keep it well skimmed and stirred with a wooden spoon. Pour into pots, and cover in the usual way.

Rhubarb Wine.—To every pound of green rhubarb stocks, when bruised, put a quart of cold spring water; let it stand three days, stirring it twice in a day; then press and strain it through a sieve, and to every gallon add four pounds of loaf sugar, the juice and half the rind of a lemon; put it into a cask with half an ounce of isinglass dissolved in a little of the liquor, and add a gill of brandy. Do not bung the cask closely for a month, and bottle in ten or twelve months more.

Fruit.—With the approach of the warmer weather the prudent housewife will pay more attention to this part of her menu. Make the dish of cooling, anti-bilious fruits attractive by selection and arrangement. Nuts belong to winter time, when fats are needed to produce carbon. Raisins, always unwholesome, clog digestion weakened by "spring fever" and irritated morbid livers. Apples are out of season, but oranges and bananas valiantly relieve guard between them, the grapes and late pears that lasted after the holidays and the coming berries. The juice of a lemon, mixed with four times as much water, unsugared, and drunk just before bedtime, will do more to counteract malarial influences and correct a surplusage of bile than a dozen blue pills.

How to Boil Asparagus.—Asparagus of the stouter sort, always when of the "giant" variety, should be cut of exactly equal lengths, and boiled, standing ends upward, in a deep saucepan. Nearly two inches of the heads should be out of the water—the steam sufficing to cook them, as they form the tenderest part of the plant; while the hard stalky part is rendered soft and succulent by the longer boiling which this plan permits. Instead of the orthodox twenty minutes allotted to asparagus, lying horizontally, which half cooks the stalk and overcooks the head, diminishing its flavor and consistence, a period of thirty or forty minutes, on the plan recommended, will render fully a third more of the stock delicious, while the head will be properly cooked by the steam alone.

A Lesson of Life.

What a lesson to the young men of the country is taught in the brief career and sad fate of young Charles Gehring, who took his life yesterday in a room at a Park Row hotel. The deceased was a favorite son of a wealthy brewer at Cleveland, O. He was only a little over 30 years of age. His opportunities would have enabled him to lead a useful and a happy life, for he had command of all the money he needed and his natural advantages were such as would have made him a favorite among his associates. He chose a course of riotous living and dissipation, and the suicide's death at the very threshold of life is the end!

What were his last words, dying, away from home and friends, with none but strangers around him? "I—am—tired; I—want—rest!" he faintly murmured, and then death closed his lips forever. But what a world of meaning, what a history of vain pleasures and bitter disappointment was conveyed in those few broken words.—New York World of Wednesday.

Six Children at a Birth.

The wife of the syndic mayor, Castagnola Ticino, has given birth to six children. This fact is testified to as absolutely correct by an authoritative Berne correspondent. The woman, whose name is Rezzonico, is 38 years of age, and has already had three and four children at a birth. Her husband is married for the second time, and has seven children by his first wife.

The six children, four boys and two girls, were born living but died soon afterward. The news of the extraordinary event, perhaps hitherto unheard of in the annals of anthropology, has created a great sensation, especially in Italy, and doctors are hastening to the scene from Milan, Como, and other towns to satisfy themselves of its truth.—New York Sun.

CATARRH IN THE HEAD.

SYMPTOMS OF THE DISEASE.—Dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; the eyes are weak; there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; the voice is changed and has a "nasal twang"; the breath is offensive; smell and taste impaired; there is a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility. Only a few of the above-named symptoms are likely to be present in any one case. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated by physicians.

COMMON SENSE TREATMENT.

If you would remove an evil, strike at its root. As the predisposing or real cause of catarrh is, in the majority of cases, some weakness, impurity, or otherwise faulty condition of the system, in attempting to cure the disease our chief aim must be directed to the removal of that cause. The more we see of this odious disease, and we treat successfully thousands of cases annually at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, the more do we realize the importance of combining with the use of a local, soothing and healing application, a thorough and persistent internal use of blood-cleansing and tonic medicines.

CHIEF RELIANCE.

In curing catarrh and all the various diseases with which it is so frequently complicated, as throat, bronchial, and lung diseases, weak stomach, catarrhal deafness, weak or inflamed eyes, impure blood, scrofulous and other taints, the wonderful powers and virtues of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cannot be too strongly extolled. It has a specific effect upon the lining mucous membranes of the nasal and other air-passages, promoting the natural secretion of their follicles and glands, thereby softening the diseased and thickened membrane, and restoring it to its natural, thin, delicate, moist, healthy condition. As a blood-purifier, it is unsurpassed. As those diseases which complicate catarrh are diseases of the lining mucous membranes, or of the blood, it will readily be seen why this medicine is so well calculated to cure them.

LOCAL AGENT.

As a local application for healing the diseased condition in the head, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy is beyond all comparison the best preparation ever invented. It is mild and pleasant to use, producing no smarting or pain, and containing no strong, irritating, or caustic drug, or other poison. This Remedy is a powerful antiseptic, and speedily destroys all bad smell which accompanies so many cases of catarrh, thus affording great comfort to those who suffer from this disease.

PERMANENT CURES.

The Golden Medical Discovery is the natural "helpmate" of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It not only cleanses, purifies, regulates, and builds up the system to a healthy standard, and conquers throat, bronchial, and lung complications, when any such exist, but, from its specific effects upon the lining membrane of the nasal passages, it aids materially in restoring the diseased, thickened, or ulcerated membrane to a healthy condition, and thus eradicates the disease. When a cure is effected in this manner it is permanent.

Both Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy are sold by druggists the world over. Discovery $1.00, six bottles for $5.00. Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy 50 cents; half-dozen bottles $2.50.

A complete Treatise on Catarrh, giving valuable hints as to clothing, diet, and other matters of importance, will be mailed, post-paid to any address, on receipt of a 2-cent postage stamp.

THE LARGEST ORCHESTRA.

Three Hundred Players, Not One of Whom Sees the Rest.

At the Western penitentiary in Pennsylvania there is a nightly concert given by what is probably the largest orchestra in the world. It is composed of at least 300 players, who never see one another. The music begins at precisely 6 o'clock every evening, and ends at the stroke of 7. Within that hour the convicts are permitted to make, each independently, as much music or discord as he pleases. This prison is, perhaps, the only one in the United States where the inmates are allowed to cultivate the art of music, and the privilege is deeply appreciated by them. Just before 6 o'clock they may be seen by the officials, sitting with their instruments in readiness. As the hour strikes, they begin to play and rattle off tune after tune during the appointed time.

As may be imagined, with several hundred instruments playing at once, it is impossible to distinguish any one of them from the rest, or to tell one tune from another. As the waves of sound rise and mingle, the listener can only be reminded of a wind howling in the distance.

"They look forward to this hour with great pleasure," said one of the keepers to a reporter. "Music is the only thing that varies the monotony of their lives, and taking an instrument away from a prisoner is about the severest punishment we can inflict."

As they were talking there was a moment's silence. It was a few minutes before 7, and a man began playing "Home, Sweet Home" on a violin.

His neighbor accompanied him on a guitar, and in a short time they were joined by a flute, cornet and mandolin. The prisoners in the upper tiers of cells seemed to be waiting for the beginning of the favorite melody, and one by one caught it up, until all were playing the tune. The sounds ceased at the stroke of 7, and quiet reigned supreme.—Youth's Companion.

A Husband's Solicitude.

Robinson—So you are going to Europe, Brown? Brown—Yes, for a couple of months. I haven't been very strong lately, and I think the trip will do one good." Robinson—I hope so. Mrs. Brown will accompany you, of course? Brown—N—no; my wife has complained of not feeling very strong recently, and I'm afraid to have her undertake the trip.

The Other Kind.

She—Sorry to miss you the other night when you called, but I was at a progressive euchre party and won a prize. He (with much meaning)—Ah, but you might have done the same at home! She—True; but I never play for the booby.

Into Print at Last.

Wife (looking over a newspaper)—Dear me, there is a big dry goods firm in this city named Catchem & Cheatem, and they have a stock worth half a million dollars; the store has been open a year, it appears.

Husband—You don't say so? I never noticed their advertisement. What part of the paper is it in?

Wife—I have not noticed their advertisment either. I find the name among the list of business failures.

Her Fault.

If she is made miserable by day and sleepless at night, by nervous headache, pains in the back, easily grieved, vexed or made tired, or is suffering from any of those wasting functional disorders peculiar to women, such as prolapsus, ulceration, leucorrhea, morning sickness, or weakness of the stomach, ect., a brief self-treatment with Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription will convince her of the folly of enduring misery that can be so easily, pleasantly and radically cured. Druggists.

Value of Young Men.

A young lady in Atlanta stepped to a window to look at a young man passing by, and just then a large piece of plastering fell down on the chair she had vacated. Had she kept her seat she would have been killed.

Consumption Curable.

Since the fact that consumption is both preventable, and in its earliest stage curable, it has lost much of its terror. If the first symptoms are at once recognized, and the proper remedy applied, very few, if any one, need die with consumption, which is really lung-scrofula. Like many other diseases this formidable one grows out of impure blood, and this, in turn, from a diseased liver. Hence, we have the hacking cough, the pains in chest, the inflamed lungs, and all the symptoms of hastening consumption, all the result of depraved blood and diseased liver. The use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will arrest all such symptoms, restore the liver to healthy action, and send streams of pure blood into every organ. Of druggists.

Silly mothers in the fashionable circles of Paris have aroused the indignation of the medical profession by applying the horrors of face painting to little children. In the public gardens babies of 3 years old may be seen whose eyebrows have been blacked or dyed. Other anxious parents, distressed at the vulgarly ruddy and rustic hue of their children's cheeks, carefully powder them before sending them out. Little coquettes of 10 years are not permitted to go abroad until the regulation black stroke has been painted beneath their eyes.

ITCHING PILES.

SYMPTOMS—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form, which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It is equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT can be obtained of druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

Ever Ready.

Locomotive Builder (on a railroad train)—The reason we are kept waiting here is because the engine has broken down. I have examined it, and if I only had the proper tools I could fix it in half an hour." Helpful Wife—Here's a hairpin, dear.

Tender Corns.

Soft corns, corns of all kinds removed without pain or sore spots by Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor. Thousands testify that it is certain, painless and prompt. Do not be imposed upon by substitutes offered for the genuine "Putnam's" Extractor. Sure, safe, harmless.

Wm. Gerlich, aged 10, drowned himself at Flushing L. I., yesterday, because his mother had whipped him.

George Muller, celebrated throughout the world as a worker for the good of his fellow-men, is now 82 years old, and as full of zeal and activity as ever. He has just returned to England, after a preaching tour of 37,000 miles through Australia, China, Japan and other countries. Two thousand children greeted him at Bristol upon his return, the little ones being inmates of his orphanage in that city.

FLESHERTON:
THURSDAY, JUNE 14, 1888.

THE EDITOR AT CONFERENCE.

From Flesherton to Brampton our route lay through a country too well known to most of the readers of THE ADVANCE to require any additional information at our hands in this connection. Westward from Brampton, however, new scenes opened up before our vision. From the town last named until you come to Seaforth, nearly one hundred miles farther West, one seems to be constantly passing through a series of magnificent agricultural districts. Smiling meadow and grain fields with a background here and there of gloriously foliaged trees burst upon the vision in endless succession. Here and there were streams of water, but such muddy, sluggish, lazy, filthy ones as shocked the senses after gazing upon the charming surroundings. They reminded one of hideous pictures enclosed in magnificent frames.

Guelph is a beautiful city "set on a hill so that it cannot be hidden;" and, like all the rest of the towns and cities in this beautiful Western country, is surrounded by a rich agricultural district.

Stratford is no doubt a very nice city, but as the situation is not so elevated as that of Guelph, the traveller cannot see it to the same advantage. Here we changed cars and almost the first sight which met our gaze as we approached the Seaforth train was the beaming countenances of our esteemed pastor, Rev. J. W. Shilton, B.A., and our well-known townsman, Squire Armstrong.

Seaforth is situated in the midst of one of the most fertile and beautiful agricultural districts in the Dominion. It is a compactly built little town of probably 3,000 inhabitants or thereabouts. The business places are located almost entirely on one street. The Methodist Church, within whose walls the Guelph Conference is now in session, is a very fine building with a large seating capacity, and admirably adapted to the purposes for which it was erected.

BILLETING.

Much dissatisfaction exists in connection with this feature. People are located they know not where. They have not, in scores of instances, the slightest knowledge of the kind of people they are expected to associate with. Sometimes a representative comes in contact with people after his own heart, but more frequently there is diversity of tastes, opinions and everything else, which has the tendency to send the delegate out on the streets in order to seek for more congenial companions. This is apt to hurt the feelings of host or hostess, but it is a lesson people who have charge of this billeting business would do well to profit by in future. We spoke with scores of ministers and laymen and all pronounced themselves most emphatically in favor of stopping at hotels, for reasons very well known. Several delegates refused to be billeted at private houses and went to the hotels—preferring to forfeit the $2 deposit rather than run the risk of uncongenial companionship and diversity of tastes.

THE NEW PRESIDENT.

Rev. Geo. Richardson, Chairman of the Listowell District, was elected President of this Conference on the second ballot. The President-elect is a tall, slim gentleman, with very striking features. His sunny countenance, pleasant manner, and the wisdom and depth of his utterances, are but the outward manifestations of the great warm heart which beats within. A grand good man is President Richardson and eminently fitted to adorn the highest office in the gift of any Methodist Conference.

REV. J. W. SHILTON, B.A.

Readers of THE ADVANCE will be delighted to know, that, notwithstanding the many changes made by the Stationing Committee this year, the pleasant relations existing between pastor and people on the Flesherton Circuit have not been disturbed. Rev. Mr. Shilton will return. Let us add further, that in this great gathering of representative men—men of intellect—not one stands higher in the estimation of your humble servant than does Rev. J. Walker Shilton, B. A. When he rises to speak there is profound attention. His culture and education enables him say what he has to say clearly, pointedly and briefly. With many Conference debaters, there is more chaff than grain—it takes them a long time to say anything to the point; and even then the point is a mighty dull one.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS.

Rev. Dr. Carman, one of the General Superintendents, is here. He is a model presiding officer. Clear-headed, clear-sighted, a thorough Christian, and a true gentleman, the most marked attention is paid to him when he rises to address the Conference. Nearly all his addresses are sprinkled with brilliant and pointed witticisms; but, above all, they are pervaded by the spirit of true Gospel doctrine.

Rev. Dr. Burwash, Chancellor of Victoria University, is another great and good man, who has honored the Guelph Conference by his presence. On Thursday night he delivered a brilliant address on the subject of education. Friday morning he spoke cheering words in connection with the great College federation scheme.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS. Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste. It is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

The Reason Why

Ayer's Pills are so popular is, that while always reliable as a cathartic medicine, they never leave any ill effects. This is because they are purely vegetable, and entirely free from calomel or any other dangerous drug. In all cases, therefore, whether the patient be old or young, they may be confidently administered.

In the Southern and Western States, where derangements of the liver are so general, Ayer's Pills have proved an inestimable blessing. D. W. Baine, New Berne, N. C., writes:

"I suffered a long time with stomach and liver troubles. I tried various remedies, but received no benefit until I commenced taking Ayer's Pills. These pills benefited me at once. I took them regularly for a few months, and my health was completely restored."

Throughout New England, next to lung diseases, Stomach and Bowel Complaints are the most prevalent.

Dyspepsia

and Constipation are almost universal. Mr. Gallacher, a practical chemist, of Roxbury, Mass., who was long troubled with Dyspepsia, writes:

"A friend induced me to try Ayer's Pills, and, after taking one box without much benefit, I was disposed to quit them; but he urged perseverance, and, before I had finished the second box, I began to experience relief. I continued taking them, at intervals, until I had used eleven boxes. Suffice it to say, that I am now a well man, and grateful to your chemistry, which outstrips mine."

The head and stomach are always in sympathy; hence the cause of most of those distressing headaches, to which so many, especially women, are subject. Mrs. Harriet A. Marble, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., writes that for years she was a martyr to headache, and never found anything to give her more than temporary relief, until she began taking Ayer's Pills, since which she has been in the enjoyment of perfect health.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8.

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines,

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

LIVING FOR THE NEXT GENERATION.

A burden to itself is the life that is lived without an object. It is a rainless cloud, a well without water and a discordant note in social harmony. Such lives sometimes deserve our sincerest pity; for since their commencement their record has been one of unceasing struggle for a bare existence, or a half-despairing bearing up under repeated disappointments. Sometimes they justly merit the strongest condemnation; for notwithstanding the best beginnings and the most favorable surroundings they would not be persuaded to take hold voluntarily on any of the grand principles that lead to success nor keep an object in view that would impart importance to their years and unity to their actions. Every successful life has been lived for some supreme object. Elevated by a worthy purpose, clarified by a pure motive, it has been made a centre of helpful influences through its own succeeding, making success easier to others. The real workers whose work abideth are they who live for an unselfish object, who live in the present, on the past and for the future. They are the heirs of all the ages past, the trustees and executors for all the time to come. And while some lives are spent in mere sensations, emotions and recreations like blossoms that nevvr develop into fruit, these are devoted to practical persuits, heroic endeavors, or foresighted enterprises; laying solid foundations for coming generations and passing on to them the seed germ of future greatness. We all owe much to the past; do we all realize the important claims of the future and so seek to hand on to generations yet unborn the capital with interest which we have inherited from the noble workers who have entered the silent land. In a stern material sence we are greatly indebted to the past generation and under the most sacred obligation to the coming one. These crownless kings, untitled noblemen and unmedaled heros they who as first settlers fought our battles with hands so brave and hearts so dountless are the company to whom we are most heavily indebted. They braved the dangers of the ocean before the helpful secret of the steamer was breathed into the ears of men. They began their work without a word of welcome to cheer or encourage them. Their capital was their principles, their machinery their muscles, their educators experience and their hope and reward a well earned home. They cleared the fields, they cut the roads, they built the mills, erected the bridges and changed the wilderness into a "delightsome land" and made the desert to "rejoice and blossom as the rose." Into their labors we have entered, whether we are land-owners or not. One of Britain's best philosophers said: "my some half dozen neighbors own these farms around me but who owns the landscape; every one who has eyes to see and a mind to appreciate it's beauty. What our country is now we owe largely to the laborers of the past. Shall we not enter into their labors and give to the next generations in this district a country still further enriched, improved aud beautified. The vein of profitable improvement is not worked out. Their are lutent capacities in this land which we have not dreampt of yet. And whether we plan a city, or build a bridge, or cultivate a farm or arrange a garden, or plant a tree, besides finding enjoyment and profit in such work let us in all sacredly consider our duty to live for the next generation and for the wear of other lives.

On social grounds we are also clearly and constantly constrained to live largely for the next generation. Good society and pleasant social intercourse are amongst the most endearing things of this life. It cost much to give us the social privileges we possess to-day. Tyranies had to be dethroned despotisms maimed, monopolies abolished and a thousand benevolent institutions reered by which an atmosphere has been created in which sweet social life is possible. And we owe it to the next generation to make social life still better. In the remote past social intercourse was founded on fear, now it is largely founded on equal rights and eventually it will be founded on "love, purity and fidelity." Society, if it can be called such, was formerly ruled by physical force, it is now largely ruled by common sense and we as executive stewards of the future must so labor and live that in the coming time it may be ruled by Spiritual Law.

And in matters spiritual we are under still more sacred obligation to live for the next generation. On this subject:—

> "I sometimes hold it half a sin
> To put in words the truth I feel,
> For words like nature half reveal
> And half conceal the truth within."

Through the darkness of savage paganism and the gross darkness of religious paganism a little of the light celestial has come to the people of this generation. It is our most sacred inheritance. Let it be treasured with care, utilized with devotedness and in renewed clearness bequeathed to nations yet unborn. The noble reformers began a grand work, let us continue that work until it results in the spiritual emancipation of all men. Let not the next genoration have to rise in judgement to condemn us because of our pagan practices, our superstitious beliefs and our superficial conclusions. Neither let us give to them "a religion" of mere negotions, dead forms and morbid sentiments; but by all the means within our reach ever live to nuiture them in a faith that is anchored in eternal vereties, held by intense personal conviction, and practiced in manliness, cheerfulness and honor and then our life will not have been in vain.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Temporary amalgamation.—The Editor of the ADVANCE being away and the Editor of the Patriarch just going away for a week, we have resolved on a joint issue, or at least the ADVANCE will give the Patriarch as much space as it can.

Comparsions.—Lest anyone outside of our own membership should be mis-led as to the relationship existing between the two papers, let it be remembered that from time immemorial comparison has been an element in hasty description, and that it is only for the sake of describing the Patriarch that the two are sometimes mentioned together. As a matter of fact there is no rivalry and no kind of competition between them. They are the best of friends, each works aiong its own line. Their one aim is to help one another and to promote the public good.

Our principles illustrated.—It certainly speaks well for our principles and for those who hold them that our esteemed Brother Field, so young, modest and retiring can be left in charge of such important business as the entire management of the Flesherton Printing Establishment for nearly three weeks. Let Bro. Field keep "at it," aim at real efficieny and not be put off his guard by mere puff. Let him continue as he begun and he will be influential, wealthy and wise—when others who as to occupation have "boxed the compass" will be despised, penniless and foolish.

The za-za—notwithstanding the Dr's labor, expense and good intentions the za-za proved the worst undertaking he has ever taken in hand. The players were a talented group no doubt and their selections were all that could be desired. But as to the music itself—well, if it had not been for the big flight of stairs the Canadian Band might have come and brought an action against us for infringing on their patent.

Conferences, associations, conventions and general assemblies will be all over by the time for our next meeting. Let us therefore have a good meeting and a bright and cheerful time a week from next Wednesday night.

DIVISION NEWS.

One interesting communication came to hand just a day too late for last month's issue. Correspondents would oblige by taking a large share in our literary work, and also by sending in their contributions in good time.

The International Royal Templar comes regularly to hand each issue. It is well worked widly scattered and cannot fail to do good.

Dr. Christoe and his associates deserve our heartiest thanks for their patient painstaking and ardenous labor in connection with our last meeting. All criticisms we have heard of said meeting, have been very favorable.

Brother Latimer got his fingers burnt pretty badly while engaged in the gas experiments last meeting. He does not regret his misfortune and is always willing to take his part in whutever permotes the welfare of the Order.

By next meeting we expect Bro. and Sister Beecroft to be with us again safly home and quite restored to health.

The members received last initiation are likely to be of real value to the Division and will doubtless find in its meetings much to employ, interest and profit them.

Brothers Irwin and Shore attended the teachers convention in Durham last week. On their way they practesed the pedestrian art, and while there no doubt enjoyed the meetings and contributed [illegible] share to the convention's success.

J. W. Armstrong, Esq., ex-D.C.W.P. is attending the Methodist Conference at Seaforth.

A. R. Fawcett, Esq., D.C.W.P. is also away on the same business as the same place and in connection with his journey will take his annual holidays. We wish him a pleasant time and a safe return. Mrs. Fawcett accompanies him.

Sister E. Brown has pressing invitations to visit friends in "dear old Scotland" and will do so if her father's health permit.

Bro. Victor Kester is on the ADVANCE staff and gives good promise of succeeding in his well chosen calling.

The glad spring time has brought no signs of life to the Eureka Division. Surely its root is still alive.

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editor of the Patriarch.

Dear Bro.,—I shall endeavor to [illegible] a short note on "Truthfulness."

We believe that truthfulness is something which we all should practice if we wish to be successful in life, not merely truth in word but also in act. How many there are who would think it a great sin to deliberately tell an untruth and yet would try to mislead or deceive, not thinking that it was just as great harm to decive as to say that which is not true. Have we not heard little children saying (after misleading some person) "well I didn't tell a story." How much better it would be if we would always be truthful in the true sense of the word never fearing the consequence knowing that the truth may be blamed but not shamed. I think we may congratulate ourselves on having so much of that good quality existing in our Division. Hoping that my few remarks will be received in a kindly manner. Allow me to remain Yours in Love Purity and Fidelity. A SIS.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

"Yes," of Yore.

A maid of yore had suitors seven,
  Of low and high degree,
And of them all she loved but one;
  This maid, oh! sly was she.

A task she set them all to do—
  A garment each to frame
Of equal size and numbered seams,
  To work they joyous came.

The flying needles she would thread,
  Thus aid alike the band;
And whose finished first his robe
  Should claim by right her hand.

Thus in and out the fabric wove
  The shining points of steel,
Each bearing well its linen load
  As long as it could reel.

But one there was whose bodkin oft
  She slyly filled the while
Of threads as long by only half
  As were the rest in guile.

Thus soon triumphantly arose,
  This youth, and proudly laid
The garment fashioned thus complete,
  And won the wily maid.

So life continues to this day,
  Men duped by woman's arts,
Ne'er dreamed that she herself, not they,
  Finesse the trump of hearts.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

"Guy, who can think you so?" she asked, lifting her head, and looking at him proudly.

"Thousands," he answered. "My darling, think! You, in your faith and trust, have never doubted me for a minute—you bore noble witness to that effect to day—but others will not believe in my innocence. My own, do you not see that to many the motive for such a crime is evident in my love for you? His life, poor fellow, was the only thing to stand between us—between you and me. Shirley, it would have been easier, Heaven knows, to me to die than to see you tried as you were tried to-day. My poor girl, if I could have spared it you!"

"And—and"—the lovely face was full of an unspeakable horror—"do they say—do they think you killed Hugh to—to—oh, Guy, I cannot say it!"

She sunk down in an agony of pain. Somehow this thought, so intensely horrible to them both, had never struck her; but now it filled her with an unutterable shame and anguish. Was this what they were saying of them? Was this what they believed? Oh, it was awful! No shame could equal this—no disgrace was ever so great!

Guy was grieved beyond measure at the effect of his words. She lay in his arms, trembling with an intense suffering which he was powerless to control; all the life seemed to have died out of her face as it rested against his breast; her breath came in quick faint gasps; for a moment he thought she was dying, and would have summoned assistance, but she stopped him.

"Call no one; let no one see," she said, with stiff white lips; and he waited anxiously until the terrible emotion had in some degree passed away and a faint shade of color had stolen back to her lips.

"I have startled you—forgive me," she said gently, disengaging herself from his arms; and moving a little way from him, she sat down in a low chair; and a silence fell between them—a silence of strange embarrassment; a silence so intense that one could have heard a pin drop in the room.

"Guy, is it true?" Shirley asked at length in a curious strained voice.

"That they will say so? I fear so indeed, love," he answered tenderly. "But"—he moved to her side and bent over her—"need we mind that Shirley?"

She looked up at him with a blind, bewildered expression in her hazel eyes, an expression which filled him with pain and fear for her.

"Darling," he said softly, kneeling down by her side and encircling the trembling form with his arms, "you will come to me now, will you not? Not quite directly perhaps—I would not ask that—but in a few months. Remember how long I have loved you, how much I have suffered from our long and cruel separation. There is nothing between us now. Forgive me for speaking of this, my darling—it is soon, I know, and selfish to urge my wishes on you; but, Shirley, all this time I have longed for you, and it has been very hard to bear."

"Very hard, Guy," she repeated, softly, looking into his face with earnest, tender, sorrowful eyes from which the horror had all departed now, leaving only intense sadness in its place.

"They have been such weary years, my own," he went on huskily—"those years of wandering and striving—how hard Heaven only knows!—to forget you; but your face was ever before my eyes, your voice always in my ears, the touch of your dear fingers always lingering in my hand. Once, when I was very near death—I had met with an accident and fever had ensued—I thought you were standing beside me, I thought that I prayed you to put your lips to mine once and kiss me before I died. Shirley, my own, would you have cared so much?"

"I wonder—I wonder if you can guess how much, Guy?"

"My darling!"

He clasped her to him with sudden passion; but she disengaged herself gently but firmly from the tender arms, having her hands in his as her eyes rested upon him with an intense love and sadness, an agony of renunciation and woe which he would not, he dared not, understand.

"Oh, Guy, poor fellow!" she murmured softly; and the tears gathered slowly in her eyes.

How changed he was—how terribly changed—and how greatly he had suffered! It broke Shirley's heart to add to that suffering; and yet how could she go to him, bringing with her a confirmation of the horrible suspicion which people had entertained? How could she marry him when the marriage would but confirm his guilt and shame? Yet, reading the agony on his face and feeling the acute pain of her own aching heart, how could she send him away? He had left her when his love might have brought with it shame and disgrace. Did she love him well enough to ask him to leave her?

Oh, the weary struggle which ensued in the sorely tried heart—oh, the agony of conflicting doubts and fears! Had she any right to send him away when she loved him so passionately, and when she was free to return his love? Had she any right to add to the unhappy, solitary, loveless years he had already spent? Had she any right to make him suffer further torture and agony? And yet to add to that unmerited shame which had already fallen upon him! Could she do it—she who loved him?

"My darling"—how tender his voice was now in the new dread which had come upon him, and which he would not let her see!—"you must not let the past trouble you any longer. It is all over, and together we will forget it. You look so frail and white, Shirley, that I can not be happy until I see some roses in your cheeks, and until these little hands"—kissing them softly as he spoke—"have a little more flesh upon them. You have been very ill, they tell me."

"Yes; but I am quite well now, Guy," she answered tremulously, and hid her face upon his shoulder, as he knelt by her side, to shut out his pleading face, so worn and haggard, yet so full of tenderness and love; and he folded his arms round her so gently that the pain at her heart deepened, and she dreaded with a yet more earnest dread what was to come.

"Do you remember, Shirley, one night long ago at Fairholme Court, that some one—I forget who now—sung some lines about the 'radiant grace of to-day,' begging the present to remain, and asking—

What future can restore, when thou art flown
All that I hold from thee and call my own?

I remember so well thinking that, happy as the present was, it was the eve of the day which was to give you to me, my darling—that the future would be yet happier, that it could hold no great grief for us since we were to share it together. But the great grief which came to us ere twenty-four hours had elapsed we could not bear together; we had to bear it apart. Now, my dearest, there is nothing to separate us. Looking far into the future, I can see no shadow of another parting from you, my own."

"Can you not, Guy?" she whispered softly, still with her eyes hidden.

"I cannot, darling, save for the few months which must elapse before I come to you and ask you to put your hands in mine and come to me, my darling, my wife! But this will not be like a parting; it will be but for a short time, and we shall be able to see each other often, dear."

"Guy"—she spoke still with her face hidden against him, but now she lifted her hand and rested it fondly and caressingly on his shoulder—"Guy, could anything make you doubt my love for you?"

"I think not, love," he answered softly, drawing her closer to him.

"Even if I were to hurt you?"

"Even then, Shirley."

"You would know—ah, you would be sure, would you not, that I did so only out of love to you, and because I knew it was best for you?"

"I would try to think so, my darling," he answered softly, a sudden dread chilling him as he listened to the words which seemed so difficult to utter, spoken as they were so slowly and brokenly, with the fair head bowed upon his breast.

"You would try? Thank you, Guy. Oh, my darling, my darling!"—she clung to him now with sudden passion, her head pressed against him with a convulsive strength—"won't you help me? I cannot say the words, but—but—you can guess them without my saying them."

"What words, Shirley?" His voice was very low, as he bowed his head over her; and, rising to his feet, he lifted her and supported the beautiful head resting heavily against his shoulder, as she stood trembling in every limb, prevented from falling only by the strong arms which enfolded her.

"That—oh, Guy, I cannot tell you—do not ask me! Help me—help me!"

There was a moment's silence. Guy Stuart had no need to hear the words to know her meaning, and yet he could not, he would not, understand.

"What is it, Shirley? Tell me, dear. You are breaking my heart with this suspense," he whispered huskily. "What can it be that you find so difficult to tell me?"

"I love you—I love you!" she moaned feebly.

"Is that so hard to say, Shirley" he said, a faint smile parting his lips for a moment.

"Not that, not that, but—"

Her head sunk yet more heavily against him, the breath came from her lips in heavy gasps, but her brow was damp and cold: she was physically unable to tell him, she had strength only to suffer and to cling to him with trembling weak little hands, as she rested against him. But in all her misery she was conscious of the loud throbbing of his heart, of the unsteadiness of his hands, and she felt with a strange intuition the look in his eyes which she could not meet.

"Well, dear?" Guy said softly, although her evident agitation cut him to the heart.

"Guy, you must—"

"What must I, my dearest?"

"You must—oh, Heaven, this is horrible!" she moaned in her misery, suffering too greatly now even to think of his pain. "You must go away and—never—see—me—again!"

The words came as if each required an effort, and, low as her voice was, each syllable was distinct and clear.

"I must go away and never see you again!" he echoed, forcing a smile. "What folly is this, my little one?"

"It is not folly," she said faintly. "It is the truth, Guy."

"That I am to go away," he questioned, trying to lift her head and look into her face, "and never see you again, Shirley? Let me look at your face and see if your eyes tell me the same foolish thing which your lips utter."

She lifted her face and looked at him, and Guy knew then her determination, and felt that she would hold to it if it cost her her life. Her face was ghastly pale and drawn with suffering; but in the dim eyes which met his for a moment there was an expression of agony, renunciation and anguish which he never forgot.

"I do not understand you, Shirley," he said gently. "Why must I go?"

"Guy, dearest, do not make it so hard for me," she answered pitifully. "Can I—can I add shame to your name?"

"My name! It is dishonored already," he said passionately. "For Heaven's sake, Shirley, let there be entire frankness between us now. Is it that you no longer love me?"

"Ah, how soon you doubt me!" she rejoined, with a smile sadder to see than any tears. "And only a few moments ago you said that nothing could make you do so."

"But, my darling, what am I to think?" he said hoarsely.

"You must think"—the sweet voice was low and broken and faint, but so full of music in its tenderness—"that I love you too well to bring disgrace upon you. Oh, my love, my love, think! Could we—could we give the world what they would call a certain proof of—of our—guilt?"

"What does it mater?" he asked, bitterly. "They will think me guilty. Shirley, if you love me, you will not send me away."

"Ah, my dearest, it is because I love you that I send you away!" she murmured faintly; and, with a sudden anger flashing into his gray eyes, he removed his arms from around her and half turned away.

A little cry of pain broke from her, and she slipped down upon her knees at his feet, bowing her head upon her arms in an agony of grief and shame. Guy stood looking at her for a moment in silence; then, turning away from her, he threw himself into a chair and covered his face.

After all he had suffered, after years of desolation and loneliness, after shame and disgrace and misery, this was the end! A foolish scruple, a regard for the opinion of the world, was to come between him and happiness.

An intense stillness reigned in the little room; the fire was dying out, and it was beginning to feel chilly and cold. As she crouched on the rug, the steps of the passers-by in the street beyond the little garden reached Shirley's ears and seemed to fall upon her heart; and, when a coal fell from the grate near her, she started and trembled. It seemed as if death were in the room, the silence was so heavy and oppressive; and it appeared to Shirley as if death indeed were there—the death of her hope and of Guy's love, which were to be buried with all the bitter past.

Was he very angry with her—very grieved? Did he think she did not love him! Ah! how could she hurt him so when he had suffered so much through his love for her already, and yet he had so much to suffer? How her heart ached for him.

She dragged herself across the room, on her knees, to his side and lifted her little fingers and tried to remove his hands from his face.

"Guy?" she moaned pitifully. "Guy, won't you speak to me—only one word, my darling—only one word."

"What can I say?" he said huskily, removing his hands and looking at her with eager, passionate, sorrowful eyes. "What can I say, my poor child? Perhaps you are right. But, Shirley, let people say what they will; if we are happy—you and I together, my own—we can give the world the go-by. We can go abroad, you and I, where no one will know us; in happier climes we will forget all this misery, and we will not mind that here in England they say that you have married the man who murdered your—oh, great Heaven, it is too horrible—it will drive me mad!"

"Guy—oh, Guy, my dearest, hush!" she implored, seeing how agitated he was. "Oh, my poor darling, I wish—I wish we had never met!"

The words were wrung from her breaking heart as she stood, trembling and pale, watching the strong man's agony. What after all was her suffering to his? What could her pain be to that which brought such a ghastly pallor to his face and such drops of agony to his brow, which made him stagger as he crossed the room to open the window and lean out into the cold night-air, for he felt stifled and choking in the little room? After a few minutes he came back to where she stood and took her once more into his arms.

"Shirley," he said very tenderly, and with the weariness of a great suffering on his face, "we will not discuss this any more now; we are both unfit for any further agitation, and we cannot talk this over dispassionately and calmly to-night. Besides, it is getting late, and you want rest, my poor wounded bird. But at another time, my own, you must let me persuade you that you are wrong, that there is no trouble, no disgrace, no shame that cannot be lessened if you share them with me. And I do not think it selfish in me to urge you, dear, because, even if you share the disgrace and the name I offer you is a dishonored one, I think my love is great enough to make up for it all. And now"—his voice, grave and weakened by suffering, faltered a little here—"I will say good-night, my own love, and leave you to your rest."

He stooped over her with a tenderness which almost broke down the composure she had striven so hard to attain; and, lifting her hands, she clasped them about his neck.

"Guy," she whispered, "you will do something to please me, will you not?"

"What is there I would not do, my own?" he questioned gently, smoothing the soft hair on her brow, and looking down with intense love into the sweet, changed, lovely face.

"This will not be difficult," she answered, smiling faintly. "It is only—Do you sleep well at night, Guy? Your eyes look so tired and worn. Are your nights bad now?"

"I have been rather restless lately, dear; but of course that was only natural."

"And to-night you will go straight to bed and try to sleep?"

"Are those my darling's orders?"

"They are my entreaties, Guy. I cannot bear that look of unrest and suffering on your face."

"It will not be there long, Shirley. Do you ever think of the sadness on your own, dear? It is the saddest, loveliest little face in all the world! And now"—he drew her closely to his breast, and, as she stood, she could feel his heart throbbing against her shoulder—"I must say good-night, my darling."

"Good-night, Guy. You have not given me your promise yet."

"What promise, sweet?" he said, his eyes lingering over the earnest face as if they could not tear themselves from it.

"That you will have a good night's rest."

"That I will do my best to obtain one?" he corrected, smiling. "Yes."

"And that you will try to forget all the trouble of the past, Guy, and to think only of the mercy which has been over us all through it all."

"'Our darkness but the shadow of His wings,'" he quoted softly. "Ah, darling child, how often that line helped me through all this troubled time!"

His face was beautiful now with the sudden light which came into his deep gray eyes as they looked into hers, and Shirley's sweet pale lips parted into a little smile.

"I often forgot it," she whispered. "But I know you never did, Guy. And now good-night."

She unclasped her hands suddenly and released him; but Guy held her firmly and tenderly.

"Are you sending me away thus?" he said, with a smile. "Do you think I will submit to such treatment, my own? Have you no other good-night for me, Shirley?"

She hesitated for a moment; then she lifted her hands again and clasped them about his neck, and drew the tall head down to hers with a sudden passionate tenderness. Their lips met in one long kiss, then she gently disengaged herself, and, without a word, he passed out, leaving her alone with the memory of that close kiss upon her lips as she sunk down upon her knees by the table and hid her face upon her arms. And thus Lucie found her half an hour later when she came in gently to tell her that it was almost mid-night, and that they were waiting to go to bed. And the face Shirley raised when the gentle hand touched her chestnut hair shocked and pained Lucie more than it had ever done in all that time of misery, and it haunted her often afterward.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

The promise Guy had given was hard to keep, for he felt anything but inclined to rest when he and Oswald left Mrs. Jackson's cottage and walked toward the hotel where they had put up. The streets of the old-fashioned town were perfectly quiet then; for all the crowds which had thronged them during the earlier part of the day had dispersed homeward.

Oswald glanced at Stuart more than once with an earnest pity and sympathy on his face.

"You found her changed, Stuart?" he asked, as they walked on.

"Terribly changed, poor child!"

"Ah, but she has been ill! She will soon look like herself again."

"Heaven grant it!" Guy said earnestly; but the dark shadow was not lifted from his face, and the yearning sorrow in his eyes only deepened; and, when they entered the sitting-room together, the langour of his movements rather startled his friend.

"Do you feel ill, old fellow," he asked gently; "or are you only very tired?"

"Only very tired," Guy answered, forcing a smile—"so tired that I feel as if I could willingly lie down and sleep the rest of my life away if I could. But I do not feel at all sleepy; my brain is on fire, I think; it burns and throbs incessantly."

"It is from want of rest and from anxiety," Oswald answered gently; but in his eyes there was a pity and fear he did not dare to put into words. "And you have had—perhaps it was impossible but that you should have had—a painful interview with Shirley. Do you know, these last days seem to me to have passed like a dream. I have been speaking and walking and writing in a kind of mechanical manner; but I have not realized yet, I think, that poor Glynn is gone. Stuart who could have done that evil thing?"

"How do you know but that I am the guilty one?" Guy said, restlessly pacing up and down the room, pushing back his thick dark hair from his brow, with a feverish gesture of pain as his troubled shining eyes met Oswald's. "How can you tell? I hardly know myself sometimes! It is all so strange and unreal! How was it they acquitted me to-day, Fairholme? How was it? I don't know!"

"There was no proof against you, old fellow. Don't talk of it, Guy," Oswald answered gently and gravely. "How could they bring you in guilty of a crime that you never committed?"

"They acquitted me because there was not sufficient proof against me," Guy answered, with a deepening of the pain and shadow in his eyes, "not because they did not think me guilty—I saw and felt that. In the eyes of hundreds there is no more guilty man in England than myself."

"All those who know you, Guy, have not doubted you for a moment. You have not forgotten the testimony your friend and brother-officers bore for you to-day."

"That was more esprit de corps than real belief in my innocence," Guy said earnestly and passionately. "They were concerned about the disgrace which would fall upon the regiment if I were convicted."

"You no longer belong to it."

"Ah, but I did belong to it!" Guy said quickly. "Fairholme, I tell you my life is blighted and dishonored. Never more can I walk among my fellow-men save with the brand of a cowardly murderer, one who decoyed a defenceless man to take a lonely walk and murdered him in revenge for a wrong done years ago. Ah, if I had killed him then in my first passion, they would have excused it. But to wait—to feign friendship and—"

"Stuart, for Heaven's sake, cease! You are feverish and excited and overdone. In the morning," Oswald added earnestly, "you will see all this in a different and truer light."

"Shall I?" Guy said wearily. "Ah, no, old friend! My eyes are open now. That poor child saw it too. She understood that I— But I promised her to try to sleep," he added. "And you are tired, Oswald. I was not to keep you up."

"You promised Shirley?" Captain Fairholme said gladly. "That is good news, Guy, because you will keep your word."

"If I can," Guy answered, smiling faintly. "What a trouble I have been to you, Oswald—almost ever since we met! Good-night, dear fellow."

Their hands met in a long clasp expressive of earnest friendship and good-will and kindness; and Oswald left Guy at the door of his room to go to his own, almost too anxious to sleep, fatigued and worn out though he was.

And, in his own room, lighted by fire and lamp, Guy Stuart threw himself into an arm-chair and bowed his head upon his hands, and sat there while the hours passed and the night wore on, sleepless, restless, fevered; anon rising and pacing the room with quick steps, then throwing himself upon the bed to try to keep his promise to Shirley, then rising once more and going back to his arm-chair by the fire, to sit there staring with wide weary eyes into the dying glow, only to rise again and resume his perambulations.

He could not rest; his brain was throbbing and excited, his eyes were sleepless and burning. An intense weariness was upon him; but it was a weariness which repose could not lessen. He was weakened by anxiety and confinement; the strain had been too great even for such a powerful frame as his. For nights and nights he had not slept in prison. It was not his own fate which had troubled him; it was Shirley who had filled his thoughts; that her sorrow and anguish should be made public, that the love which he had buried so deep in his heart should be brought to light again, had tortured him with an intensity of suffering which had worn out both body and mind.

And now, though the ordeal was over, the suffering remained. Although he had been pronounced guiltless, the shadow of evil had fallen upon him, foul suspicion rested upon him; he was blighted, dishonored, shamed! He felt to the depths of his soul how true Shirley's shrinking from him had been—that she was right when she told him that they ought not to meet again; that, if they married now, the evidence against him would be infinitely stronger, the suspicion of his guilt infinitely darker. And yet it was very hard, bitterly, unspeakably hard that they should suffer so intensely when they were innocent of all wrong!

The fire died out unheeded, the night hours wore on, but no rest came to the burning eyes and throbbing brain. Guy Stuart sat and thought and thought until thought became an unmeaning chaos, and his brain grew confused and bewildered.

Chilly as the night was, he felt stifled in the room; he went to the window, staggering slightly as he walked—for he was weaker than he was aware—and, throwing it open, leaned out into the night-air, looking with blind unseeing eyes at the silent deserted street, where the gas-lamps were flickering somewhat in the wind which had risen during the last hour. Resting heavily against the window frame, Guy Stuart let the soft breeze blow upon his burning brow and cool his aching eyes. He remained there for some few minutes, the reaction after his intense excitement creeping over him slowly.

As he stood, a man passing by in the street glanced up at the window and went swiftly on his way; but Guy staggered back with a hoarse cry of terror and pain, pressing his hands to his eyes, as if to shut out some horrible vision, and shaking with a fear which was new and strange to him. When, a minute later, he glanced out again, there was no one in sight; and he went back to the fire with the wild troubled look deepening in his eyes.

"Is my brain going?" he murmured, half aloud. "Am I going mad? It was of course a delusion of the brain; but——"

He fell back in his chair, covering his face with his hands once more, and gradually his great exhaustion conquered thought; his eyes closed, his aching limbs stretched themselves out to rest, and a heavy sleep—the sleep of intense fatigue—fell upon him.

The night wore on; the dawn came, and the sun rose high in the heavens, but the sleep—heavy dreamless sleep, like that obtained by a narcotic—still held him in its stupor. When he awoke, his eyes, opening slowly and blindly, fell on Oswald's anxious face, as he stood beside him holding a letter.

"Stuart, how is it with you?" he said, bending over him; and bewildered still, Guy held out his hand for the letter.

got to thinkin' of her—both her parents dead and gone—
And all her sisters married off, and none but her and John
A-livin' all alone there in that lonesome sort o' way,
And him a blame old bachelor, nfirmder ev'ry day!
I'd knowed 'em all from children, and their daddy from the time
He settled in the neighborhood, and hadn't ary a dime
Er dollar, when he married, fer to start housekeepin' on:
So I got to thinkin' of her—both her parents dead and gone!

I got to thinkin' of her, and a-wunderin' what she done
That all her sisters kep' a-gettin' married one by one,
And her without no chances—and the best girl of the pack—
An old maid, with her hands, you might say, tied behind her back!
And mother, too, afore she died, she ust to jes' take on,
When none of 'em was left, you know, but Evaline and John,
And jes' declare to goodness 'at the young men must be blind
To not see what a wife they'd git, if they got Evaline!

I got to thinkin' of her; in my great affliction she
Was sich a comfort to us, and so kind and neighberly—
She'd come, and leave her housework, fer to he'p out little Jane,
And talk of her own mother 'at she'd never see again—
Maybe sometimes cry together—though, fer the most part, she Would have the child so riconciled and happy-like, 'at we Felt lonesomer'n ever when she'd put her bonnet on
And say she'd rally half to be a-gittin' back to John!

I got to thinkin' of her, as I say—and more and more
I'd think of her dependence, and the burdens 'at she bore—
Her parents both a-bein' dead, and all her sisters gone
And married off, and her a-livin' there alone with John—
You might say jes' a-toilin' and a-slavin' out her life
Fer a man 'at hadn't pride enough to get hisse'f a wife—
'Less some one married Evaline and packed her off some day!
So I got to thinkin' of her—and it happened thataway.

Tennessee's Mountain Dew Queen.

Miss Bettie Smith, of Fentress county, Tenn., who was arrested on the charge of illicit distilling, is said to be handsome and accomplished, and is supposed to have written that wild and stirring romance, "The Blue-Headed Sapsucker; or, the Rock Where the Juice Ran Out." Colonel Harvey Mathes, editor of the Memphis Ledger, says that Miss Smith is undoubtedly the author of the story. This is a startling revelation. At one time Colonel Mathes offered $3,000 for the discovery of the author.

When Miss Smith was arraigned before the United States Court at Nashville she conducted herself with such grace and dignity that the polite old Judge, deeply impressed, arose and made her a profound bow.

"Miss Smith," said the Judge, "to see you in this awful predicament seriously touches me."

"It does me, too, Judge."

"How old are you?"

"Judge, you should not ask such question; but I will tell you. I am two years older than my married sister, who was married before she was as old as I am. She has been married eighteen months, and still speaks well of her husband. Now, how old am I?"

"I cannot tell."

"I am not to blame for your mathematical inefficiency."

"Why did you go into the distilling business?"

"Because I wanted to make whiskey."

"How long have you been a distiller?"

"Ever since I was 16 years old."

"When were you 16 years old?"

"The year my father died."

"What year was that?"

"The year my Uncle Henry moved to Texas."

"Miss Smith, you are a woman, but I insist that you shall answer my questions. Remember, that if convicted of this awful charge, you will be sent to the Penitentiary. What did you do with the whiskey you made?"

"Sold it."

"Who bought it?"

"Well, Judge, it would be rather hard to tell who bought it all. Some time ago a party of gentlemen came into my neighborhood to hunt deer. The party got out of whiskey, and found it difficult to buy any. After a while I told a man if he would put his jug down on a dollar and go away, he might, when he came back, find the jug full of whiskey. He did so."

"Would you know the man?"

"Oh, yes, sir; I recognized him in a moment. You are the man, Judge."—Arkansaw Traveller.

Mr. Gladstone, Earl Spencer and the Methodist Preacher.

At a convention of Wesleyan Methodist lay preachers recently held in Northampton, England, the Chairman of one of the meetings related the following incident which occurred some years since at a village three miles from Northampton. It is a little bit of unwritten history: "Lord Spencer and William Ewart Gladstone were out walking one Sunday evening, when they heard sounds of singing coming from an old barn. After some hesitation they entered, and were so interested that they stayed to the end of the service. The sermon on that occasion was preached by a Methodist local brother, who was a poor, hard-working, industrious man. Service over, the right hon. gentlemen had a conversation with the preacher, and one of them told him he had never heard the gospel preached so faithfully and well in his life before, and he further gave him all the change he had in his pocket."

"The bulk of my fortune I wish to bequeath to my scapegrace nephew George," said the dying man.

"Why, it was only yesterday he called you an old skinflint," said the lawyer. "I'd cut the boy off"

"That's all right," replied the testator. "You make out the will the way I tell you. I know enough about wills to know that if I leave him all the money he won't get a cent of it."

ENGLISH MILLIONAIRES.

Some of the Largest Fortunes Lately Recorded in the British Isles.

The incidence of the probate and succession duties has become a subject of interest, says the London Globe. The actual amount paid in respect of these duties for the financial year just ended has not been published. The succession duty for the year 1886-87 yielded £814,764, and the probate duty £4,036,469. The latter, at the rate of 3 per cent., therefore represented personal estate valued for probate at about £121,000,000. Since Christmas last four wills have been proved, passing personalty of more than £9,500,000. Sir William Miller, a Scotch merchant, left £1,023,000; Lord Wolverton, a banker, of Welsh descent, £1,820,338; Mr. Hugh McCalment, an Irish merchant, £3,121,931; and Baron de Stern, a German financier, £3,544,978. One other estate exceeding a million was, it is understood, passed by a will proved in the financial year just ended. In no previous year, it is believed, have five estates paid duty on more than ten and a half millions. In twenty years the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in his budget speech only three estates of three millions each have paid probate duty. Fifteen other estates last year, varying in amount from £496,000 to £665,000, gave a total of nearly nine millions, and twenty-one, with personalty exceeding a quarter of a million and under half a million, paid duty on seven and a half millions more. It is probable that about a hundred wills were proved, disposing in each case of less than £250,000 and more than £100,000, with an aggregate of perhaps fifteen millions. The whole number of wills proven in this country last year may very likely have been about fifty thousand. From ten of these more than a tithe of last year's probate duty was obtained. Over a third of the duty was contributed by the estates of not more than 150 rich people, the average amount of whose personalty considerably exceeded £250,000, while the average of all the other estates would be probably less than £2,000 each. The income tax returns show that in this country property is becoming more evenly distributed each year. The result of this distribution seems to be that less wealth is accumulated than when property was in fewer hands. The income of the country does not appear to be increasing at the same rate as formerly. Notwithstanding the windfall this year from a few great estates, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was probably right in regarding the yield from the death duties as likely to be inelastic. The ownership of land in this country is rarely now the means of accumulating wealth. Of the twenty fortunes exceeding half a million each which have been noticed all were made in business. Among the twenty-one other estates with each more than a quarter of a million personalty, were only three or four of great land-owners. The desire of rich men to become owners of land is apparently decreasing. It is seldom now that money is left to be invested in the purchase of land.

Next to the five millionaires the largest personal estate left in the last twelve months was that amounting to £654,431 of Mr. Perrins, of Lea & Perrins, of Worcester, at whose shop, it is said, a lady on her return from India, many years ago, left by chance a recipe for curry which suggested that for the famous sauce, and next to Mr. Perrins' was the estate, worth £666,449, of Mr. Thomas Jessop, of Sheffield, who generously gave back to the company which bought his business £40,000, the amount by which the valuation of his stock and plant exceeded his estimate. Mrs. Pemberton-Heywood, the widow of a Liverpool banker, left £651,237; Mr. Charles Cave, a West India merchant and partner in the London bank of Prescott, Grote & Co., £613,900, and Mr. Hardie Farquhar, a banker in St. James' street, £544,684. Mr. Robert Campbell, one of the early settlers in New South Wales, left £617,818. Mr. George Benton, the contractor, £606,593; Mr. Charles Waring, £552,000; Mr. James Haworth, who died intestate, £593,000; Mr. Joshua Fielden, £503,598, and Lord Hindlip, the senior partner of Allsopp & Sons, £557,577. Sir Alexander Matheson, whose personalty was worth £643,759, had much landed estate, but he was also a part owner of the Rio Tinto copper mines and the head of an old firm of China merchants. Mrs. Morrison, who left £612,000, was the widow of Mr. James Morrison, who, after serving an apprenticeship with her father at his merchant shop by London Bridge, became his partner—and hers—and in time built up the great wholesale trade of the Fore street warehouse.

The late Commodore Vanderbilt is said to have died worth $184,000,000, or about as much as 100 of the richest estates in England paid probate duty upon last year. To have made a fortune of two, or three, or even five millions of pounds sterling in 20 or 25 years is spoken of as not an uncommon occurrence in America. Such fortunes, if, indeed, they are made at all, must, of course, be made by speculation, and not in the ordinary course of trade. There is no indication that wealth can be acquired in this country, even on a small scale, in the way that it is said to be gained in America. Riches, when not inherited, seem to be slowly earned by the people whose wills are proved in England. The estates with personalty between £250,000 and £500,000 offered for probate last year included those of Mr. Chas. Seeley, £496,901; Mr. Thos. Simon Bolitho, £414,563; Mr. W. B. Phillimore, £367,943, and Mr. R. Berridge, £312,567, who were all considerable landed proprietors, but Mr. Belitho was a Cornish banker, Mr. Berridge a partner in Meux brewery, whose purchase of the great estate of the Martins, of Cro' Martin, was probably not a remunerative investment, and Mr. Seeley and Mr. Phillimore did not, it is believed, owe their wealth chiefly to their land. Among sixteen or seventeen other estates of more than a quarter and less than a half a million were those of Mr. Stevens, proprietor of the Family Herald, £287,331; Mr. Alexander, a bill broker, £381,671; Mr. Joseph Maynard, a city solicitor, £436,383; Mr. Synott, an Irish merchant, £259,227; Mr. Geo. Crosfield, a Warrington soap manufacturer, £320,462; Mrs. Gibbs, the widow of the well-known agent of the Peruvian Government, £408,000; Herr Krupp, £273,125; Mr. Lionel Cohen, of the stock-exchange, £423,447; Mr. C. R. Fenesick, a ship broker, £408,000, and Mr. J. H. Smith, a banker, £388,928.

A QUEER BEDFELLOW.

The Startling Nocturnal Discovery Made by a Sojourner in Texas.

I am encamped in the deep forests on the carboniferous hills of Young County, says a Texas letter in Forest and Stream. My temporary shelter is a small cabin of a single room, full of cracks through which things can creep. This morning an hour before dawn a heavy storm descended upon us, and the air grew quite chilly. While lying in my comfortable little bed listening to the howling of the wind and pouring of the rain, I felt a strange movement in the bed. It was not the movement of an earthquake, or of a whale, or of an elephant; yet I immediately recognized it as a movement of a very moving nature one that might involve terrible consequences. I felt it again, and it was not only in bed, but under the cover with me. Just at this juncture I felt something very slick and of a somewhat cold nature move against my hand. The time for action evidently had come, and I did not deliberate what action to perform, but performed at once. With one fell bound I vacated the bed and landed in the middle of the floor with such a thump that the cabin shook all over. In a moment my lamp was burning, and seizing a club I approached the bed and cautiously pulled down the cover. There lay a snake, beautifully coiled up, with his head somewhat uplifted, licking out his tongue at me. He was about four feet long. He looked at me and I looked at him. He made no motion as if he would run and neither did I. I thought I spied a gentle and confiding expression in his eye, as if he said: "You need not be alarmed; if you will not hurt me neither will I hurt you. If you will be my friend I will be yours." I threw my club aside. I perceived that my bed-fellow was a bull-snake, almost precisely like the rattlesnake in markings, but in no other respect like that monster. He is without fangs, without poison, and of a gentle, playful and amiable nature. He grows eight or nine feet long. I said unto him that he and I should be friends; that he might not only dwell with me in my cabin, but that, if he liked he could sleep with me in my bed. Having said that much I carefully spread the cover over him and told him to sleep on. And he did so. But I did not go back to bed to him. I sat by my table and read a few chapters of St. Paul, who, of all authors, is my favorite. How logical, how forceful, how grand and ennobling he is! On returning from breakfast I brought one of my fellow-workmen with me to show him my friend and bed-fellow. When I drew back the cover, there he lay, perfectly quiet and content, but licking out his tongue. My fellow-workman was dumbfounded. I then put the cover back again. A few moments ago my snake descended from the bed in a quiet way, as if entirely at home, and is still probably somewhere in the house. He was probably engaged in hunting mice when the storm came up, and becoming chilled in the changed atmosphere he found my bed pleasant and concluded to sleep with me

How to Kill Moths.

The destruction of moths is one of the greatest vexations which careful housekeepers have to contend with, and their depredations are not to be remedied after they have once made inroads. Houses heated by furnaces are especially predisposed to have moths, but every housekeeper must be on the watch for them, for, from the time that the windows begin to be left open the trouble begins. Heavy carpets do not require taking up every year unless in constant use. Take out the tacks from these, fold the carpets back, wash the floor in strong suds with a tablespoonful of borax dissolved in them. Dash with insect powder or lay with tobacco leaves along the edge and retack. All moths can be kept away and the eggs destroyed by this means. Ingrain or other carpets, after shaking, are brightened by sprinkling a pound of salt over the surface and sweeping carefully and thoroughly. It is also an excellent plan to wipe off the carpet with borax water, using a thick flannel cloth wrung tightly, taking care not to wet it, but only to dampen. Open the windows and dry the carpet before replacing the furniture. Other woollens, including blankets and wearing apparel, must be beaten and brushed and folded smoothly. Be careful to clean every spot with ammonia water, not too strong, and a dark woollen cloth. Tie pieces of camphor into little bundles and put one in each article. Wrap the articles in newspapers, as printers' ink is a great preventive of moths, and sew them up in strong sheeting bags, labeled so it will not be necessary to open them during the summer except for use. This is a good way for those who do not possess cedar boxes, and the articles need have no other care if every spot is treated as directed and the garments are not left hanging in the closet too long before putting away for the season. Any one moving into a house should see that the rooms are disinfected. No agent can guarantee that there has been no infectious disease in the house; he does not know anything about it. Commence at the cellar first and go through each room. This should be done before you take possession if possible, but if it is not convenient it should be done before you get settled. An ounce of sulphur may save many a dollar of a doctor's bill. Sulphur and alcohol are the most satisfactory disinfectants, and they possess another advantage in being inexpensive. The alcohol is only necessary to cause the sulphur to ignite quickly. The sulphur will burn without it, and if you have no alcohol take three or four lighted matches and place them on the top of the sulphur and it will soon take fire. All silver or gilt articles should be removed from the room while the sulphur is burning, otherwise they will be very much discolored and in some cases destroyed. In houses that have furnaces matters are considerably simplified. The sulphur can be put in the furnace, all the registers can be opened and the whole house disinfected at the same time. If the fumes become too strong open the cold air shaft and the windows, and they will soon be dissipated.

A REMARKABLE CASE.

A Man to be Tried for a Murder Committed Nearly Forty Years Ago.

The case of Jesse D. Graham, who is now in prison at Santa Cruz on a charge of having murdered Dennis Bennett 38 years ago, promises to be one of the most striking cases in the criminal calendar of this coast. The facts are these:

On April 22nd, 1850, Dennis Bennett was shot dead at the door of his house at Cyante, in Branciforte (now Santa Cruz) county. Several witnesses—namely, one Dennis Connor, James Robinson and Mr. Hoyt—were in the house at the time and testified that they saw the murder committed by Jesse D. Graham. Other witnesses—to wit, Mansell Bennett, Jackson Bennett, Mary Bennett, Mary Ann Bennett and Julia Bennett—were before the grand jury and gave evidence in corroboration. On this an indictment was found, which was signed by William T. Wallace, then District Attorney, since Chief Justice of the State, and now Judge of Department No. 6 of the Supreme Court in this city. That indictment is still on file in the county clerk's office at Santa Cruz. For some reason or other Graham was never brought to trial for the murder. Here the stories diverge. A surviving relative of the murdered man says that Graham fled, and remained in hiding for several months in the Santa Cruz mountains, where he was supplied with food by his father; that three years afterward he was captured in Tuolumne county, but that the captors were induced to surrender him to his father in exchange for $5,000; that he then escaped to Texas, where he lived many years; that he finally returned to Southern California; that he went by the name of Jones. On the other hand, friends of the prisoner says that he never was in hiding; that he lived unmolested at Santa Cruz for over six months after the finding of the indictment; that he has repeatedly visited that place since, under his own name, without interference from any one; that he has frequently met members of the Bennett family—the witnesses against him—and was never denounced by them. It is noticeable that, so far as appears, the prisoner's friends do not deny that he killed Bennett. One peculiarity of the case, which seems to command more attention in Santa Cruz country than it would do here, is that the prisoner is said to rely upon the fact that the alleged murder was committed before California was a State of the Union, and that, therefore, he cannot be tried under its criminal code. California was not admitted till September 9th, 1850, and Bennett was killed, as we saw, on April 22nd of that year. But California had been a territory of the United States—though it had never had a recognized Territorial Government—for three years prior to the murder, and the Territorial condition carried with it the common law. A murder was as much a murder before as after the admission of the State, and was punishable in the same way, by the same procedure and with the same penalty. If Bennett killed Graham, and the fact can be proved by credible witnesses, it is not seen how it will avail him to show that the deed was committed before California was admitted and while it was working under the Constitution of Monterey.—San Francisco Call.

W.," and as differing in some details from the common reports.

Educating Arabian Girls.

"Educate a girl!" exclaimed a Mohammedan to Dr. Jessup, a missionary among the Arabs, who was urging him to place one of his daughters in a girls' school in Tripoli. "Educate a girl! You might as well try to educate a cat!" Several aristocratic Mohammedan gentlemen of Beirut were induced a few years ago to place their daughters in one of the Protestant schools there, and one of them remarked: "Would you believe it? I heard one of the girls read the other day, and she actually asked a question about the construction of a noun preceded by a proposition! I never heard the like of it! The things do distinguish and understand what they read after all!" The other replied: "Mashallah! Mashallah! The will of God be done!"

A curious domestic complication came out in a Brooklyn court on the application of an old man for the arrest of his young wife, who had eloped with a younger and handsomer man.

THE PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Most Popular Personage in Great Britain—Her Early Life.

The Princess of Wales is the most popular personage in Great Britain. So far as the institution of royalty is concerned it can be truly said of her that her life is the most valuable in the kingdom. So long as she lives her popularity will be sufficient to keep the cause of royalty well protected from popular innovation. I have tried to obtain from those who know the Princess of Wales well the secret of her great popularity. She is not a brilliant woman, she has never written anything, and in conversation she never impresses anyone with the idea of her having any particular originality or striking force of character. In ordinary society, without the advantage of her position, she would make but little impression. She is excessively ladylike and refined. She has a most marvellous beauty, which chiefly consists in regular features, a fair complexion and a perfectly serene and placid expression. The most remarkable feature of her good looks is the preservation of her youthful appearance. In the broad glare of daylight she looks to-day as young if not younger than her eldest daughter. Her figure is also slim and slight as that of a young girl. She dresses with exquisite taste and appears to enjoy general society very much. The secret of her popular charm is said to be this: She has the rare and gracious faculty of impressing people who come in contact with her in the casual meeting of a general reception or a levee with her genuine cordiality. People who have been presented to her and who have simply seen her bow and smile, and perhaps have heard a half dozen words of commonplace greeting, are the ones who are the most wildly enthusiastic over her. Her bearing before the public constitutes her chief charm. Every one is led to believe that she is the most gracious and winning personage in the kingdom. It is this outward suggestion upon the part of the Princess of Wales of brilliant graciousness that has captivated and thoroughly charmed the British public. Those who know her best say that a more intimate acquaintance with her does not bear out the public estimate. She is thoroughly refined, accomplished and self-possessed, but is not interesting in a general conversation. While I was on the continent last month I heard a number of interesting stories concerning the early life of the Princess of Wales. These stories are not particularly new, and I do not propose to allude to them except to give the exact income of her father before he was called to the throne of Denmark. This prince lived in the most obscure poverty for a number of years. He had an income of exactly $1,200 a year. There were five children to be supported and educated from this beggarly sum. The young ladies of this household learned to cook, to sew and to do all kinds of housework. They were obliged to make their own dresses for many years. No members of any family so obscurely placed have risen to more brilliant positions than this Danish family. The head of the family became the King of Denmark. His oldest son is, of course, the Crown Prince of that country. Another son is the King of Greece. His three daughters are the Princess of Wales, the Czarina of Russia and the Duchess of Cumberland.—T. C. Crawford in New York World.

Dresses at the Opening of the Glasgow Exhibition.

The Princess of Wales was most becomingly attired in the palest shade of grey; her dress, which was of alternate silk and satin stripes, was trimmed with passementerie of the same delicate shade, and soft folds of crepe were arranged on the front of the bodice and the skirt; her grey transparent tulle bonnet had a bouquet of white flowers, with pale green leaves, and she carried a small grey chinchilla muff. The Duchess of Abercorn's dress was of fawn-colored silk, trimmed with passementerie, and her bonnet of tulle of the same shade was ornamented with large white wings; the Marchioness of Lothian wore dark green foulard, and her dark green bonnet had a brown bird on one side; Lady Campbell of Blythewood was in light grey, and her grey tulle stringless bonnet was ornamented with white flowers and a small feather; Miss Campbell wore black, with cowslips in a black tulle bonnet; the Marchioness of Breadalbane had a heliotrope dress, over which was worn a black lace dolman, trimmed with jet and passementerie; her high bonnet of heliotrope tulle to match was trimmed with a white bow on one side. The Countess of Rosebery wore a black velvet and jet mantle and a red tulle bonnet; the Hon. Elinor Hamilton had a dress of dark green cashmere and a high hat trimmed with dark green velvet, pink bows and a large bunch of pink flowers; her sister wore brown; Lady King wore a crushed strawberry satin dress, and her bonnet of the same shade was trimmed with velvet of a deeper tone and ornamented with Indian embroidery.

Great Scotch Travellers.

Among the Scotsmen connected with African discovery have been James Bruce, the Abyssinian traveller; Mungo Park, the discoverer of the Niger; Colonel James Augustus Grant, the discoverer (with Speke) of the Victoria Nyanza; Joseph Thomson and Keith Johnston; and, the greatest of all African travellers, Dr. Livingston, who, between 1840 and 1873, discovered the great Lakes Nyassa, Tanganyika, Bangweolo and the Lualaba (Upper Congo). Dr. Robert Moffat, Livingstone's father-in-law, also deserves mention in the same honorable field of missionary enterprise.

He Was a Poor Manager.

"We must curtail expenses," said the husband to his sweet wife. "Indeed, and I don't see how anybody could be more saving than I am. We've got a family of four of our own and two servants, and yet I manage to get along, my dress bills and all, with only a little over $200 a month." "And I get a salary of $100 a month." "Well, you must get them to raise your salary. You have the least management about you of any person I ever saw. Oh, if I only were a man!"

A recently published book on etiquette says: "Endeavor to select your guest with a sense of fitness." That is, do not invite a fat man to a slim dinner.—Hotel Mail.

Mrs. Teed, near Heathcote, died last week, and was buried in the cemetery here on Saturday. Her husband died about a year ago.—[Thornbury News.

An old man named Boyce, of Meaford, attempted suicide on Tuesday by taking laudanum. The doctor saved him with his little pump.—[Thornbury News.

It is reported from a reliable source that burglars attempted to break into the residence of Messrs. C. W. Bodley and Thos. Blakely, Wellington street, the night after the robbery at Dr. Marseilles and Mr. Yeomans', but the noise made by the burglars in trying to effect an entrance awoke the inmates and the robbers decamped.

Well Done.—A few days ago a number of children were playing down by the river, and one of them, Mr. D. O'Connor's little daughter, fell into the river. The river at this point was swift and quite deep. and the little girl was quickly carried down stream. Several of the children ran towards the village giving the alarm, but the 7 year old son of Mr. John Leslie who was present, threw off his clothes, and being a clever swimmer jumped in and overtaking his little playmate, assisted her to land. The boy exhibited a courage and presence of mind often lacking in much older people.—[Pickering News.

Settled.—The difficulty between Chas. Willoughby and Wm. North, of Proton, was settled last week before Police Magistrate Ryan. The trial took place at Holstein. North was fined $20 and costs and Willoughby $1 and costs. Mr. A. S. Clark, of Mt. Forest, appeared for Willoughby and Elgin Myers, of Orangeville, for the defendant North.—[Shelburne Free Press.

On Wednesday last a cow owned by the Misses Carswell, con. five Tecumseth, gave birth to twin calves, and not to be outdone another of the same herd brought forth triplets the next day! Now then Meaford Mirror, Pickering News and other lamb story cotems beat this if you can.—[Beeton World.

Charles Bachelor's saw mill, four miles north of Kinloss, was burned on Tuesday night, together with fifteen hundred dollars worth of lumber. Loss about three thousand dollars on which there is no insurance.—[Bruce Herald.

Mr. Anderson lost the left forefinger at the second joint last Tuesday, while setting up and fitting a hoop machine.—[Bruce Herald.

John Gardiner, who lives a little outside the town limits, on the Holstein road, had three cows killed yesterday afternoon by lightening.—[Mt. Forest Confederate.

Two dwelling houses and a blacksmith shop were destroyed by fire last week in Meaford.

Canibalistic Pugilists.—Sandy McAulay and S. Bamish had a little encounter witn each other at Proton Station last Monday in which the two combatants became very much enamoned with each other, huddling together and grasping one another to their bosoms. McAulay took a fancy to Beamish and when his mouth came near to Beamish's face, he bit therefrom about an inch and a half of flesh widening his mouth to that extent. When the fun was over a doctor was called in to stitch up the mouth of Beamish whose knuckles were skinned and one finger put out of joint. Sandy got a black eye in return for the bite and sundry other little bruises that made up for his too familiarity.

Mr. Frank McLean met with a severe accident last Monday. While working at the small circular saw in Taylor's mill his left hand came in contact with the saw and his thumb and first finger were very badly cut, the thumb being split from the point to back of the first joint. It will be some time before he will be able to go to work again.—[Chatsworth News.

Mr. Michael Howey, of Holland, had a narrow escape from serious injury on Monday morning last. While driving from Kilsyth, in company with Mrs. Burchill, his horse became fractious and upset the buggy, throwing the occupants out. Mr. Howey fell with the small of his back on a large stone and was injured about the legs, but he managed to hang on to the horse and although badly crippled managed to occupy his place at the council board the same day. Mrs. Buchill escaped without injury.—[Chatsworth News.

Returned Home.

Mrs. Edward Ross has been under the treatment of Dr. Baines, of Toronto, during the past ten weeks. About a month ago an ovarian tumor, weighing 25 lbs. 9 oz., was removed from the afflicted lady. Tuesday evening last Mrs. Ross returned home, accompanied by her husband, and we are glad to learn that she is doing as well as could be expected under the circumstances.

Dominion Day at Feversham.

Feversham sports have stirred themselves up in good form, and now large posters are out announcing that Dominion Day is to be celebrated in that smart little place in a fitting manner. The program consists of a good variety of athletic games, a grand tug of war between 10 Feversham boys and 10 from any other place, and a Cahthumpian parade of considerable magnitude. See bills for particulars, and be sure to get there on our natal day.

Home Again!

The Editor, wife and daughter returned home Tuesday evening, much refreshed after their two week's outing. THE ADVANCE has been issued regularly in the interval, and we are sure our readers will agree with us that our youthful manager pro tem, Master John W. Field, has attended to the mechanical department of our business with much acceptance. A generous friend contributed the leading editorial in this week's issue, and has assisted otherwise during our absence in his usual obliging and and able manner, for which he will please accept our warmest thanks.

The need of merit for promoting personal comeliness, is due to J. C. Ayer & Co., whose Hair Vigor is a universal beautifier of the hair. Harmless, effective, and agreeable, it ranks among the indispensable toilet articles.

Irish Lake Picnic.

The Irish Lake Picnic promises to be one of the greatest attractions of the season. The program presents a variety of features which cannot fail to draw crowds of people from all quarters of the compass. Rev. J. J. Feeny has been most indefatigable in his exertions to make the Picnic a brilliant success. Among the attractions are a Lacrosse match between Flesherton and Markdale teams, a boat race between two well known oarsmen, athletic games, &c., &c. Admission to grounds 25 cents, children 15 cents, Dinner, adults, 10 cents; couple 25 cents; children, 10 cents. See large posters for particulars.

The Newspaper.

A newspaper went through three stages, it seemed to him—(1) it was important for the day, (2) the next day it was flung aside, (3) the time came when to posterity the paper was worth its weight in gold.—Dr. Garnett on the British Museum Library.

Good brethren of the daily quill,
What words of grace doth Garnett say?
Although, for all the ink we spill,
"A penny buys" our print to-day,
And though to-morrow (like the hay Whose fate in holy writ is told)
In Susan's bin 'tis cast away—
We shall be worth our weight in gold.

Ye headlong scribes, who toil to fill
Allotted "space" without delay;
Ye hacks, attentive to your drill,
A penny buys your print to-day.
Know all men now, oyes! oyes!
When future centuries unfold
This very penny-a-lining lay—
It will be worth its weight in gold

O ponderous pages, which distill
The venom of the long dull fray
Betwixt the Pestle and the Pill—
Three pennies buy your print to-day.
When future times the Times shall weigh,
At what huge price will you be sold
When (to the broken bank's dismay)
You will be worth your weight in gold?

L'ENVOI.

Good reader, make thy reading pay;
A penny buys our print to-day;
But when the world is waxing old
We shall be worth our weight in gold.

—Pall Mall Gazette.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

"Is it for me?" he asked slowly, for his eyelids seemed weighted with lead, and the words were difficult to utter.

"Yes; but, Guy, old fellow, dear old fellow, how can I tell you?" Oswald said in a tone of intense distress.

"Tell me what? Shirley?"

The words came brokenly, hoarsely; he had started up from his chair, but he could hardly stand in his weakness and giddiness.

"This note is from her," Oswald said unsteadily. "Guy, try to bear it, old fellow; it was perhaps for the best."

"The note. Give it me."

He opened it with unsteady trembling hands, and looked at it with eager, sightless eyes.

"Read it to me," he said to Oswald, in a hoarse strained voice; and Oswald's own eyes were dim as he read the few words Shirley had traced before she left the friends whom she had loved and trusted and went out into the world alone.

"I am going away, Guy, because I love you, and because it is best for us both. Some day perhaps Heaven will be merciful and let us meet again; but, if you can, forget me, and forgive all the misery I have brought into your life. Do not seek me, dear; it will be useless. I could not bring shame into your life. If this pains you, my darling, remember that I did it in love. Heaven forever bless you, Guy!"

A moment's dead silence followed the perusal of the letter; then Guy put out his burning, trembling hand.

"I do not understand," he said, in a strained, broken voice. "Is she gone?"

"Yes; she went in the night—alone. Old fellow, dear old fellow, what are you going to do?"

"I—am going"—Guy was staggering toward the door as he spoke—there was a pause between each slow word—"going—to—my darling. Oswald—do you—think she has—gone away alone? I—saw—"

His voice died away, a great darkness fell upon his sight; he stretched out his hands with a blind groping movement terrible to see, and stood swaying for a moment to and fro; then, before Oswald could interpose, he fell forward senseless at his feet.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

A dingy little room on the first floor of a dingy house in a dingy part of London—a house standing in a faded street with two irregular rows of tall dark-looking houses, which even the summer sunshine, a sickly sunshine here, could not cheer or brighten.

Judging from the appearance and size of the houses, a passer-by would have considered that they had been at one time tenanted by persons in a different and better position in life than that of their present occupants, but that, in their failing fortunes, they had been let out in offices and floors to different lodgers, for on most of the doors were several plates and bell-handles, with names of the various tenants.

It was not a disreputable street by any means; on the contrary, it was respectable and steady, and in the immediate neighborhood of some superior squares and terraces; but it was also in the vicinity of some far inferior ones; and it was plain that the inhabitants of these latter were more frequently in the dingy debatable ground than the inhabitants of the former, for the people to be met there were mostly shabby, busy people.

It is never wise to judge by appearances, and perhaps in London especially; dinginess and dirty windows and grimy carpetless stairs are sometimes better vouchers for respectability than bran-new offices and plate glass and mirrors. At any rate, the governess agency whose office was in a dingy room of the dingy house at the corner of the street was a respectable and trustworthy place enough—more respectable perhaps than many of such establishments.

It was reached through a dirty carpetless passage, and up a bare grimy staircase, and it was itself a dingy floor-clothed room containing a high desk-table in the centre and two or three chairs, while a door on the left opened into another room, rather less comfortless, where clients could interview ladies whom they had any thought of engaging.

Dingy as the rooms were, the summer sunshine found its way even here; it streamed through the dirty panes of glass, falling in a bright streak of light on the faded and soiled covering of the floor, on the piles of letters and papers scattered on the desk-table, on the grave but not unkindly-looking woman who sat before it and received the applicants and on two of the latter—one a quiet, lady-like girl neatly dressed, the other a showy handsome damsel, who stood on this hot July day waiting for her audience while the former was having hers with the grave faced woman, who, letter in hand, was giving her the address of some situation likely to suit her.

"I have already answered several," the girl was saying rather wearily; "and people are always either suited or want more accomplishments than I am possessed of."

"Yes," said the kindly voice from the other side of the desk, "people are unreasonable in asking for so many accomplishments from one person; but your great drawback, Miss Johnson, is your not being a proficient musician."

"I know," the girl replied sadly, "but I have no chance of becoming that, Miss Milton."

"Well, they do not want music here," said Miss Milton, smiling, "so I hope you will be successful. Let me know at once, if you please."

"I will, certainly. Thank you very much." The girl tripped away, looking much brighter, and with a light step went down the grimy staircase. Half way she met another applicant coming up, a slender girl in black, who leaned rather heavily on the balustrade, and who had pushed away her heavy crape veil from her white thin face, out of which her eyes seemed to shine with a feverish lustre. They passed each other in silence, and, while the one went out into the sunshine, the other went on and knocked timidly at the door on which "Governess Agency—Miss Milton" was painted in white letters on dark-brown ground.

"Come in," Miss Milton said from within; and a slight shadow fell over her face as she saw the slender drooping figure that entered the room with a deprecating look in the sweet sad eyes which went to Miss Milton's heart familiar as she was with pain and disappointment and sorrow in the poor ladies who sought her aid.

The smartly dressed young lady was expressing her opinions and requirements in a decided and peremptory tone. There was no need for her to "go out" she said; but she wanted to see something of the world, and would like to accompany a family travelling abroad. Her list of requirements was a long one, and varied, for her "pa" had given her the very best rest a little, and you will tell me then.
education to be had for money. Miss Milton thought that it was a pity she could not have also acquired some refinement, and a manner which would make her a suitable companion for girls who would be women and honest men's wives perhaps some day.

"I have nothing, I think, likely to suit you to-day," said Miss Milton quietly. "If you will leave me your address, I will write to you; and meanwhile, if you are in this neighborhood, you might call again."

"Oh, very well; there is no immediate hurry!" responded the young lady, sweeping away in her pink gingham dress and lace-trimmed hat; and then the slender girl in black came forward and stood by the desk.

The pitying glance deepened in Miss Milton's eyes as she looked up at the little, eager, pale face with the pitiful, tremulous smile flickering on the white lips.

"You have not been successful?" Miss Milton said kindly.

"No."

"Did you see the lady—Mrs. Spears, was it not?"

"Yes, but—"

"You did not suit her?"

"It was not that," the sweet, unsteady voice answered, "but—" "You are tired. You have walked all this way in the sun," said Miss Milton gently. "Sit down and rest a little, and you will tell me then."

"I am not tired," the girl answered, conquering the agitation which was so visible in the shaking hands and quivering lips. "But she asked me so many questions—and then she would not engage me." Her head sunk forward upon her breast, and a burning blush of shame rose in her pale face, coloring it from chin to brow with a crimson glow.

"Why not?"

"Because I could not give her any reference."

"Ah, I thought so!" Miss Milton said, with a sigh. "But what is to be done, Mrs. Grant? You yourself, in her place, would have done the same thing. It is impossible, you know, to take a person into one's house, especially for such an important post, without knowing something of their antecedents."

"But I told her," Mrs. Grant answered simply, "that there were reasons why I could not refer her to my friends, and that she might trust me; and—and she only laughed."

There was a minute's pause then; the hot red glow was fading out of the sweet pale face, and she leaned wearily against the desk, looking at Miss Milton with very wistful eyes.

"I am afraid," the latter said, with a little reluctance, "that, unless you can give a reference, you will find it very difficult to obtain a situation, Mrs. Grant—in fact, I may say, it will be impossible. And it is not to be wondered at. Ladies cannot be too particular," she added a little stiffly, "in their choice of a governess."

"But I told her, as I told the other lady whose address you gave me, that I would try so hard to please her," was the earnest answer. "I am sure she would not have regretted taking me. I would have been so kind to the children, and so persevering, and—oh, she might have trusted me!"

"I do not see how you could have expected her to do so. It is such a suspicious circumstance, you having no reference, Mrs. Grant. You must excuse my speaking so frankly; it is for your own sake. Is it quite impossible for you to write to any of your friends?"

"It is impossible," the young girl answered—for, though she seemed to be a widow, she had not yet passed her girlhood

"But you are anxious beyond everything to obtain a situation?"

"Yes—oh, yes!"

"And—and"—Miss Milton hesitated, and glanced at the papers before her—"you told me that you would soon be at the end of your resources?"

"Yes," Mrs. Grant repeated.

"And if you do not obtain some work, you may be reduced almost to destitution?" Miss Milton continued earnestly. "It is a terrible thing to be in London without friends or money. You had better make up your mind to write to your friends."

"But even if it be terrible," the girl answered steadily, "to be without friends and money in London, it is better to be so than to give trouble and pain and suffering to those whom you love."

"But surely their ignorance of your condition must give them more trouble than anything else?"

The sweet troubled face dropped a little.

"At first it did perhaps," she answered; "but now so many months have gone by that—that—oh, surely they will have forgotten now! I think sometimes," she continued, lifting her wistful eyes to the grave face watching her, "that it was wrong and foolish to leave them—but I did it for the best—I did it for the best!"

Her voice had risen almost to a wail as she repeated the words; but, meeting Miss Milton's surprised glance, she colored and instantly checked her agitation.

"I beg your pardon—I forgot," she said, in a low voice; then she went on very pleadingly—"Miss Milton, could you not help me—could you not let me say you know me? Ah, you need not be afraid to recommend me—you need——"

"I think you hardly know what you are asking me," said Miss Milton coldly. "You are asking me to put my name to a false recommendation; and such a thing might be the ruin of my agency altogether."

"But you do know me!" Mrs. Grant cried pitifully.

"I beg your pardon. I know you merely as an applicant at my office for a governess's situation. You came to me two or three months ago, asking me to enter your name in my books, and I did so. I know nothing further of you, except that none of the ladies to whom I sent you would engage you, and also that three or four times, when I gave you an address, you refused with evident terror to go to that house. All these are suspicious circumstances, Mrs. Grant," continued Miss Milton, with dignity; "and really I am not justified in overlooking them even as much as I have done."

"But—but I have done nothing wrong," said Mrs. Grant brokenly; she seemed too bowed down even to resent the words.

"You forget that I have only your word for that," returned Miss Milton, compressing her lips in a displeased manner.

"Only my word!" the young widow echoed, looking up with startled eyes. "Only my word!" she repeated haughtily. "And do you doubt my word? Do you think I would tell you a lie?"

"My dear Mrs. Grant, there is no occasion for heroics," said Miss Milton quietly. "I am obliged to be very circumspect, and indeed I have departed from my usual caution in the matter already. I feel interested in you, and in your solitary position, and I have done what I could for you—more even than perhaps I ought. There is no necessity for you to turn against me because I have been unsuccessful."

"I did not mean to be ungrateful," was the earnest answer; the momentary anger had died away, and she stood pallid and trembling, leaning against the desk once more. "You have been very kind to me, but—but indeed you might safely assist me further. I know that I am asking a great deal, but——"

"You are asking what I cannot grant," Miss Milton said decidedly. "I have my good repute to maintain; and I think this such a strange and extraordinary request of yours, Mrs. Grant, that really I must decline to give you any further addresses. A person who could ask for a false recommendation would be the last person in the world suitable for a governess or any position of trust."

"Do you mean that I am not to trouble you again," asked Mrs. Grant, standing erect, with a trembling dignity which had something very pathetic in its unconscious grace—"that I am not to come here any more?"

"I should prefer your not doing so," said Miss Milton, in a rather shame faced manner. "You see I have my position to keep up. I am really very sorry; but I will return you your registration fee if you like, although I have no right to do so, as you have had so many addresses and letters."

"There is no need to return it," Mrs. Grant replied steadily; "and I should regret deeply that your position or your good name should suffer through me. Thank you for all the kindness you have shown me. I will not trespass on it further. Good-morning."

She turned away with her usual pretty dignity and grace, which struck Miss Milton even in her annoyance and displeasure, and which brought back a thought which had struck her before, that the young widow was not in the position to which she had been accustomed. She answered her "Good-morning" rather sullenly and shame-facedly, for, although she was doing only what she honestly considered her duty, she felt a pang of self-reproach as she saw the slender, weary figure, in the heavy black garments which looked so sorrowful on that sunshiny summer day, move toward the door.

There the widow turned, all the pride and haughtiness melting out of the pale face as she looked toward Miss Milton.

"Thank you, she said softly, stretching out her hand with a little gesture of farewell. "You have been very good to me, and I—I thank you."

She opened the door before Miss Milton could reply and passed out, closing it after her; and Miss Milton resumed her book-keeping with a mixed feeling of relief, regret, and compassion which was very unusual to her, and which she tried to dismiss in vain.

"I wish she had taken back her fee," she muttered, as she copied some addresses in her business-like handwriting. "Of course, she has almost had the money in stamps, et cæteras; but she looked so solitary, and—I wonder what her story is? Even sadder than most of the sad ones I hear here so often!"

Meanwhile Mrs. Grant had gone slowly and wearily down the grimy staircase, her heart heavier even than it had been when she mounted it half an hour before; and, when she reached the bottom, she rested her head for a moment on the baluster, in utter depression and weariness both of mind and body. She had walked many miles in the hot sun that morning, and she was faint with fatigue; but the pain at her heart and the weariness of her spirit were greater even than her weariness of body. It had been some little comfort to her in her loneliness in London to come to the agency and talk to Miss Milton, even when the latter had no address for her. If Miss Milton was not busy, she was quite willing to talk to her; and the poor young widow was too utterly solitary not to be glad to have any one to speak to in the great wilderness where she seemed to be cast away and lost. Now she could never go back there again—never!

She felt very desolate as she lifted her head, pulled down her crape veil, and went out into the street. It was very hot—so hot that the heat made people languid and weak. Mrs. Grant's heavy crape-trimmed draperies were not a very suitable attire for such weather, and she felt their weight and heat dreadfully as she walked on. It was a day to make one long for sea-breezes and cool drinks and fresh fruit, and to make the stuffy London streets almost unbearable.

"What shall I do? What shall I do?" the young widow said softly under her veil as she went down the quiet street; and, as she stood still for a moment to consider whither she could go or what she could do to obtain some employment, a handsome carriage dashed into the street, bringing the inhabitants to their windows to look at the stylish equipage, at which Mrs. Grant glanced carelessly and uninterestedly as it passed. It contained only one lady, a handsome fair-haired woman in cool gray attire, trimmed with a profusion of lace, who passed the black-robed figure without noticing it. But at the sight of the occupant of the vehicle Mrs. Grant turned pale as death and pressed both hands to her heart in terror; and, waiting only to see that the carriage stopped at the door of the agency office, she walked on hurriedly—so hurriedly indeed that she almost ran—until she had placed three or four streets and squares between her and it.

Then she stopped, panting, trembling, breathless, leaning against the iron railing of an area for support.

"What could she want there?" she said to herself in a paroxysm of terror. "Has she heard—does she know? And Miss Milton has my address, and she will give it to her! What shall I do now—what shall I do?"

She walked on a little way, clasping and unclasping her hands in her agitation and distress.

"I dare not go home," she muttered. "She will have followed me there; and I could not bear she should see me thus—she, of all people—she always hated me! Oh, Heaven help me, what can I do? There is no use entreating her forbearance, although I would even do that to spare him the re-opening of the wound which is perhaps healed by now. My darling, how can I spare you? What can I do?"

She opened her purse and began counting its contents with feverish eagerness and trembling fingers. They were not difficult to count, for the little purse, a dainty silver-mounted toy, was light and almost empty—half a sovereign in gold, shillings and half-crowns sufficient to make with the gold piece the sum of one pound, and two or three pennies. She counted the coins twice; but she could not increase the sum, poor child—all the money she possessed in the world,

"That will not take me far," she said, bitterly; "but it will be better to go away. If she knows I am in London, she will soon hunt me down. Ah, if I had only stayed! But I did it for the best. And now to get to a railway station," she added, with a sudden lifting of the graceful head, as if she were trying to shake off her depression. "How am I to find my way to one?"

Sauntering slowly toward her was a policeman on his beat; and she went up to him quietly and asked him to show her the way to the nearest railway-station.

"Do you mean on the Metropolitan line?" he asked.

"No—oh, no! I want to leave London," she said eagerly.

"And where do you want to go?"

"Anywhere—it does not matter."

The good-natured expression of the man's stolid face changed to as keen a look of suspicion as that face could assume, and he surveyed her from head to foot before he answered. Mrs. Grant lifted her head haughtily.

"Will you direct me, if you please?" she said, in quiet, measured tones; and something in her manner forced him to answer.

"That is Paddington Station just opposite," he said, jerking his chin in the direction he wished to show her.

"Thank you."

She turned and crossed the road, still with her veil down, and entered the station. It was comparatively quiet just then; the travellers by a train which was about to start were few, and Mrs. Grant had no difficulty in making her way to the platform.

"Where is that train going?" she said to a porter standing by.

"Torquay," he answered shortly.

Torquay! She could not go there; she might be recognized.

"Does it stop anywhere on the way?"

"Yes, it's a Parliamentary."

"Is that the only train leaving just now?"

"There's one for Hereford in ten minutes."

"Thank you."

She turned from him and entered the booking-office.

"A ticket for Hereford," she said tremulously.

"First-class?" said the official sharply.

"No—third."

"The other side of the booking-office."

Mrs. Grant looked at him in a rather bewildered manner; then she began dimly to understand, and found her way to the other side of the booking-office, where the second and third-class tickets were issued.

There was no third-class to the next train, the booking-clerk said, and Mrs. Grant's heart sunk heavily.

"What is the price of second-class?" she said tremulously.

"Nineteen and threepence."

"Will you give me a ticket?" she said eagerly; and, having paid for it, thus reducing her stock of ready money to one shilling, she hastened out of the office.

"Any luggage, ma'am?"

"No," she answered shrinkingly; and she fancied as she got into the train that the porter looked at her suspiciously; but, to her alarmed and excited fancy, every one appeared to watch her.

Barbaric Yawpers.

Stranger (to fellow passenger)—"From the west, sir?" Passenger—"Yes, Oshkosh." Stranger—"I'm from Kalamazoo, myself." Passenger—"That so! Kalamazoo is a funny name for a town." Stranger—"Yes, I s'pose it does sound funny to a man from Oshkosh; but we Kalamazoo people are used to it."

Mr. Gladstone, says the Liverpool Post, is as hale and hearty to-day as is the average man in his 60th year. At a recent reception some one addressing him expressed the hope that he was well. "Very well," replied Mr. Gladstone; "there is nothing the matter with me except the ineradicable disease of old age."

FARM AND GARDEN.

Jottings that May Be Studied with Profit at the Ingle-Nook.

Manures consisting of potash, phosphoric acid and ammonia, or nitrates, appear competent to grow large crops of wheat continuously.

An English authority has computed that in the last three or four years more pigs have died in the United States from cholera than have been raised in the British Isles.

The Massachusetts Cattle Commissioners, after due investigation, report that hog cholera in that State is fed by feeding swill containing germs of the disease brought from the west in fresh pork.

It is scarcely possible to have land free from weeds; seeds of the common weeds seem to be everlasting, and are so numerous that the plants still continue to appear after many years of most persistent destruction.

It has been found in California that a cold air blast dries fruit in the most satisfactory manner. Samples of fruit dried in this way—prunes, apricots and apples—two years ago are still in a perfect state of preservation.

A correspondent of Orchard and Garden has bagged many clusters while in blossom to protect them from rose bugs, and the uniform result has been that they have produced no grapes unless the blossoms were ready to drop or already off when bagged.

The value of any kind of farm stock is very largely determined by its feeding the first year of its life. Breeding counts for much, though every successful breeder knows how greatly the character of a young animal is changed by innutritious or improper food.

There is no quicker or handier way of disposing of refuse, soda, muck, weeds, etc., than to rot them down in a compost heap. Surely dead animals are best disposed of in this way. The most common fermenting agents used in the compost heap are stable manure and night-soil.

Professor Arnold has said: "The sooner the minds of dairymen are disabused of the idea that the ripening of cream and the development of high flavor of butter lie only in the souring of the cream the better will it be for their reputation and their pockets, and also for the consumers."

Begonias grow well in a light, sandy loam with a small addition of leaf mold. They are quite at home in the shade, but require a moist, warm temperature to fully develop the beauty of the foliage. They do tolerably well as room plants, but the dry air robs the colors of their brilliancy. Nevertheless, they are still handsome and interesting plants in rooms.

When hens learn to eat eggs they never forget the trick, and should be killed before they could teach others the habit. Eggs should be gathered twice a day during cold weather, and only glass or porcelain nest eggs should be left in at night. By noticing which hens try to break these imitation eggs the guilty fowls can sometimes be discovered.

Improved plants are like improved animals; their very improvement makes it necessary that the care by which they were produced should be continued. When this is not done they may not do nearly as well as an old kind, habituated to some extent to hardships. It is a fact that scrub farmers succeed best with scrub stock and scrub crops

A little charcoal thrown to the pigs confined in pens will be readily eaten, and will apparently do them more good than the grain. It seems to be especially needed by pigs fed mainly on corn, which is apt to sour on their stomachs and destroy their appetites. Pigs that are kept where they can reach fresh soil will often eat it, and there is no doubt that it is good for them.

It has been asserted that a given amount of food and attention will produce as many pounds of chicken flesh as it will of hog flesh. If so, why cannot farmers make poultry-raising profitable and eat nutritious chicken meat instead of so much bacon? A pound of fowl flesh will produce more physical strength or muscular power than a pound of fat bacon, but there are many people who do not believe it.

By repeated cropping with the same crop soils are more quickly exhausted than where a rotation is practiced. The rotation is also useful in avoiding diseases and insects which attack vegetation. It would appear from recent experiments with electric light upon the growth of plants that this light is capable of replacing sunlight, but whether this can be done economically has not as yet been proved.

Staggers are the result of congestion of the brain, due to overfeeding. Pigs are more often overfed than any other animals, and it is the source of nearly all the diseases to which they are subject. It affects the nerve centres in the brain and spinal cord. Give the pigs no feed at all for forty-eight hours, but only water, then begin feeding very lightly, and give the food in a shallow trough, so that it can be taken up only slowly.

To prevent the work of the borer on peach trees the Farm and Home recommends that all the earth around the tree be cleared away for a foot in diameter on each side of the trunk and down to the roots. Kill any borers that may show evidence of being present, and then paint the tree to eight inches above the ground with a mixture composed of three pints fish oil, three pints soft soap, two pounds whale-oil soap, and two pounds sulphur and return the earth to the roots.

The Magnet gives the following as an infallible preservation of eggs: "Take a teacupful of salt and lime the size of an egg, and pour boiling water on them. When cold, drain off the liquor and put it on the eggs. If too strong there will be a crust on top; if so, add more water. This is for two gallons of liquor. There is no receipt that beats this, and it can be relied upon. Eggs put down in August and used in April are just as fresh and make just as nice frostings as newly laid ones."

One benefit which the farmer who surrounds his home premises with artificial groves will realize, and which should by no means be lost sight of, is that such groves invite the insect-destroying birds, which are the farmers' best friends, in protecting fruit or other crops from the ravages of destructive insects. It is true that some of them claim a share of the small fruits, but not a larger portion, we think, than they are justly entitled to as remuneration for their work in destroying insects. Then, again, they are so companionable that their presence on the premises is worth a great deal.

FASHIONABLE SLANG.

Its Absurdities Set Forth by an Able Writer.

SILLY SENTENCES RIDICULED.

The late Dean Alford once wrote: "There is no greater nuisance in society than a talker of slang," and we must honestly confess that we agree with him. The good Dean went perhaps too far to the opposite direction in his love for pure and simple Saxon. "Use the easiest words in their commonest meaning," was his motto, and he was almost ready to maintain that though all are not gentlemen by birth, all might become such by modesty of language, by avoiding singularities, and by, in fact, talking as sensible men talk. Without adopting this as a sufficient definition of a gentleman, yet we can cordially agree with the late Dean of Canterbury in his reverence for the Queen's English and his abhorrence of senseless slang. Cant phrases and slang terms have been in use in one shape or another since the Tower of Babel, and it cannot be denied that without them much that is expressive and forcible in our language and in that of other countries would be lost. But then it should be borne in mind that slang is essentially ever changing, and that, unlike the patter of the gipsies and the secret languages of all nations, if it is without point it is utterly valueless. And yet how little can be said for the fashionable slang of to-day! Take, for instance, the word that will come uppermost in most men's thoughts—"awfully." Can anything be more supremely ridiculous than the uses to which this much-abused adverb is just now put in polite and semi-polite society? Everything is "awfully" nice, pretty, jolly or funny, as the case may be. One cannot even render a service to a fairly well-bred woman but she replies, with a smile, "Oh, thanks awfully," or

"HOW AWFULLY GOOD OF YOU."

A more idiotic abuse of the word cannot possibly be imagined. It was Carlyle, if we remember right, who once, vainly attempting to illustrate this, remarked to a young lady who had been beautifully besprinkling her conversation with "awfullys," suddenly remarked what a "——" fine day it was, and when she appeared horrified, gravely pointed out that it was in no respect worse than her silly slang. It seems hardly possible that educated men and women, who would admit of course, that the word "awful" is properly applied to the Deity, can yet fail to see how inappropriate it is when prefixed to every idle phrase. Herein would be well-bred people are at a discount as compared with the costermonger, for his slang, if it is coarse, is to the point, and has a plain and intelligible meaning. In the masher or the dude we do not expect to find brains, and consequently their vapid slang saying may very well pass unnoticed; but that otherwise sensible people should adopt certain foolish phrases because they are fashionable, and should hourly outrage their mother-tongue for no intelligible reason is, we confess, a mystery. Another phrase not quite so objectionable is "Thanks," or, "Thanks, very much," instead of the simple "Thank you." Why should you be thanked very much or very little for some trifling service? The acknowledgment does not surely require superlatives, which can in no possible way increase its value. At the dinner table you are not infrequently asked to "assist" yourself or some one else to beef or mutton. The Yankee slang for the same thing is much more vigorous though not so superfine. A guest in America would probably be asked, "Mr. Brown, sir, do you feel beef?"

There is no doubt that French idioms are very largely drawn upon to furnish English fashionable slang, and it is that as fast as they come generally into use here, so are they quickly dropped by our polite neighbors. Such words as tapis, beau monde, chaperon, and the like, are never used by Frenchmen in the sense in which we apply them, and we doubt if any other civilized nation has in its vocabulary any word equal to our "arranged," when announcing an approaching marriage in high life. It has become the fashion to make use of it, but it would be difficult to show on what ground its use can be justified or even tolerated. Matrimony reminds us of a flood of silly slang, in which not only engaged couples, but too often man and wife, are weak enough to indulge. "Owndest own," "lovey," "duckey" and "dearey," are not nowadays reserved only for strictly private occasions, when at least they may be indulged in without offending listeners, but they float around you in the drawing-room or the ball-room, and the speakers thrust themselves before you in such a manner as to say, "Don't you envy us cooing doves our beautiful language of love?" As a well-known writer has very justly observed, "A man may as well suck his thumb all his life as talk or allow to be talked to him such drivelling nonsense." Dr. Johnson had a just horror of it, and was never tired of denouncing the practice in society in his day of lugging in French, Italian and Latin phrases, as though our mother tongue was incapable of expressing the extra superfine feelings of the men and women who rejoiced in rouge, powder and ruffles. Another provoking form of slang is "You don't say so," "Dear me," probably derived from the Italian Dio Mio, or "How funny"—remarks which are thrown at you at every interval in conversation, as if they were the most original in the world and bore a strict relation to the subject of discourse. As a matter of fact, they are used partly from a pernicious habit and partly to in those who have recourse to them. But perhaps the very worst description of what we suppose we must call fashionable slang, as compared with vulgar idioms, is that indulged in by strictly religious people. An old-fashioned clergyman used to refer to his pulpit as the 'clack loft," and very offensive clack it very often is. The extreme High and the extreme Low Church are the gravest offenders in their use of religious slang, and the phrases in which their followers indulge are, as every one knows, so far removed from anything approaching to piety or reverence as to make the religion they profess to illustrate an easy mark for the scoffer.

RATHER A CURIOUS FACT

HIDE THE NAKEDNESS OF THE LAND

The most foolish colloquial craze that ever the fashionable world gave way to is the "utterly utter" rubbish indulged in by the æsthetic school. It is to be hoped that this style will soon be numbered with the things of the past, and that it will only be remembered as exemplifying to what depths of degradation indulgence in slang will lead people. Had not a fashionable theatre marked it for its own, and heaped upon it through "Patience" an avalanche of ridicule, it is possible that the "too too," "consummate" school might be "living up to" their teapots even to the present day. So true it is that there is no folly so great that the "mostly fools," as defined by Carlyle, will not adopt, if only it be fashionable. The sham artistic slang in which Mr. Whistler and his limp crew indulge is so utterly ridiculous as hardly to be worth serious comment. When pictures are catalogued as "Notes," "Harmonies," and "Nocturnes," surely we have TOUCHED BOTTOM AT LAST.

It is hard to imagine any one out of Bedlam entering a picture gallery to look for a "Variation in violet and grey," a "Note in flesh color and orange," a "Little grey note," a "Caprice in blue and silver," a "Nocturne in grey and gold," and so on. Compared to such twaddle as this, the nurse who says to her little charge, "Will Georgy porgy ride in a coachy poachy?" is a classic. There may be some excuse for the gibberish with which infants are regaled by their elders, although even this form of affectionate slang may be pushed too far, but there is none for the wilful murdering of the Queen's English in which some men and women delight, partly for the vulgar pleasure of gaining notoriety and partly because they think to feel silly, and to be silly, is a sure sign of good breeding. When will society learn that slang to be bearable must be pointed and have a meaning, that unmeaning phrases, or worse, those with an utterly distorted meaning, are as sure a sign of poverty of intellect as they are of a vacant mind? We can excuse a young man at Oxford who speaks of his friend as his "Chappie" or his "Johnny;" of his father as his "Governor" or his "Relieving Officer;" or who tells you he has been "Spierised" when he has been having his hair cut by Spiers in High street. His failing in this way is one perhaps of the least harmful of the follies of youth. But we have nothing but contempt for the grown men and women who wantonly outrage their native tongue that he or she may attract attention as an "awfully jolly" person who hates nothing so much as simplicity, "don't yer know."—London Evening Standard.

The King of Color.

It is a curious circumstance that red, the unseen color of so many, is the favorite color and may be called the king color of the normal eye. It was especially so in ancient times. If we examine the Bible we shall find that the Hebrews scarcely ever use color as an epithet, as we do when we say "the blue sky," "the purple hills." The say, indeed, "the Red Sea," but blue is scarcely mentioned as seen in nature, only in the "blue and purple and scarlet" of the tabernacle hangings, or the high priest's robes, or the pavement of the king's palace, of "red and blue and black and white marble," in the Book of Esther. Yellow, excepting as a sign of disease, is mentioned but once or twice: "Her feathers like yellow gold." But red is largely spoken of, as in later times, and perhaps as incorrectly, for we did not invent, we only inherit the expressions, "red gold," "red wine," one of these being merely orange and the other a ruddy purple. "Red hair" is a modern, or rather mediæval, inaccuracy; "red cow" we get from the ancients. These epithets all appear to show a certain fancy for calling things red as the more kingly and costly color.—Jean Ingelow in Good Words.

A Unanimous Opinion.

'Twas a glorious night and two loving folks sat upon the cliffside, with the eternal ocean flowing at their feet with a calmness and placidity that were almost appalling. They were looking at the stars above and he turned to his girl and said, tenderly "My darling, I don't understand what you can see in me to love me so." She replied: "That's what everybody says." The silence was greater than ever.—Tid-Bits.

The Story of the Primrose.

It is said that the primrose was not Lord Beaconsfield's favorite flower at all, and that the story that it was arose from the fact that the Queen sent to grace his coffin a wreath of those flowers with a card bearing the inscription, in her own handwriting, "His favorite flower." But she meant the favorite of her own husband, Prince Albert, not of Beaconsfield.

The voyage from maiden fair to womanhood is often attended with many perils. Mothers should insist upon their daughters being prepared with every means of safety. Universally acknowledged as the reliable "Life-preserver" on this rough sea of uncertainties is Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It has averted many a disaster. It has rescued many a periled life. This popular remedy is prepared especially for Woman. It is the only remedy of its class old by druggists under a positive guarantee to give satisfaction. This guarantee has been faithfully carried out by the manufacturers for many years.

Plausible, Anyhow.

"What," cried the condemned man as he stood on the scaffold, "what brought me here? What led me step by step to this fell machine of death? Oh, young man, can you not guess?"

"Whiskey?"

"No, sir, the sheriff."—Lincoln Journal.

President Cleveland confesses that once in his life he has been envious. J. P. Bass, of Bangor, sent a big Penobscot salmon to the White House a little while ago, and the President, in acknowledging the remembrance, has written: "I suppose I ought not to ask more than the opportunity you have offered me of capturing my share of the fish when served and upon the table, but I am mean enough to envy the man who caught it." Exalted honors have not abated that old-time love of fishing.

[COPYRIGHT, 1887.]

The only medicine for woman's peculiar ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded, is DR. PIERCE'S FAVORITE PRESCRIPTION. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrappers, and faithfully carried out for many years.

THE OUTGROWTH OF A VAST EXPERIENCE.

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

A BOON TO WOMEN. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar diseases.

A POWERFUL TONIC. As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the uterus, or womb and its appendages, in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic. It promotes digestion and assimilation of food, cures nausea, weakness of stomach, indigestion, bloating and eructations of gas.

A SOOTHING NERVINE. As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system.

A MOTHER'S CORDIAL. In pregnancy, "Favorite Prescription" is a "mother's cordial," relieving nausea, weakness of stomach and other distressing symptoms common to that condition. It is kept up in the latter months of gestation, it so prepares the system for delivery as to greatly lessen, and many times almost entirely do away with the sufferings of that trying ordeal.

CURES THE WORST CASES. "Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhœa, or "whites," excessive flowing at monthly periods, painful menstruation, unnatural suppression, prolapsus or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation, and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

FOR THE KIDNEYS. "Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

TREATING THE WRONG DISEASE.

Many times women call on their family physicians, suffering, as they imagine, one from dyspepsia, another from heart disease, another from liver or kidney disease, another from nervous exhaustion, or prostration, another with pain here or there, and in this way they all present alike to themselves and their easy-going and indifferent, or over-busy doctor, separate and distinct diseases, for which he prescribes his pills and potions, assuming them to be such, when, in reality, they are all only symptoms caused by some womb disorder. The physician, ignorant of the cause of suffering, encourages his practice until large bills are made. The suffering [illegible] better, but probably worse by reason of the delay, wrong treatment and consequent complications. A proper [illegible] Dr. PIERCE'S FAVORITE PRESCRIPTION, directed to the cause, would have entirely removed the disease, thereby dispelling the distressing symptoms, and instituting comfort instead of prolonged misery.

3 PHYSICIANS FAILED. MRS. E. F. MORGAN, of No. 71 Lexington St., East Boston, Mass., says: "Five years ago I was a dreadful sufferer from uterine troubles. Having exhausted the skill of three physicians, I was completely discouraged, and so weak I could with difficulty cross the room to me. I began taking Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and using the local treatment recommended in his 'Common Sense Medical Adviser.' I commenced to improve at once. In three months I was perfectly cured, and have had no trouble since. I wrote a letter to my family paper, briefly mentioning how my health had been restored, and offering to send the full particulars to any one writing me for them, and enclosing a stamped envelope for reply. I have received over four hundred letters. In reply, I have described my case and the treatment used, and have earnestly advised them to 'do likewise.' From a great many I have received second letters of thanks, stating that they had commenced the use of 'Favorite Prescription,' had sent the $1.50 required for the 'Medical Adviser,' and had applied the local treatment so fully and plainly laid down therein, and were much better already."

A VOICE FROM CALIFORNIA. MRS. ED. M. CAMPBELL, of Oakland, California, writes: "I had been troubled all my life with hysterical attacks and paroxysms, or spasms, and periodical recurrences of severe headache, but since I have been using your 'Favorite Prescription' I have had none of these. I also had womb complaint so bad that I could not walk two blocks without the most severe pain, but before I had taken your 'Favorite Prescription' two months, I could walk all over the city without inconvenience. All my troubles seem to be leaving me under the benign influence of your medicine, and I now feel smarter than for years before. My physicians told me that I could not be cured, and therefore you will please accept my everlasting thanks for what you have done for me, and may God bless you in your good work."

Later, she writes: "It is now four years since I took your 'Favorite Prescription,' and I have had no return of the female trouble I had then."

Retroverted Womb.—MRS. EVA KOHLER, of Crab Orchard, Neb., writes: "Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has done me a great deal of good. I suffered from retroversion of the uterus, for which I took two bottles of the 'Favorite Prescription,' and I am now feeling like a different woman."

Doctors Failed.—MRS. F. CORWIN, of Post Creek, N. Y., writes: "I doctored with three or four of the best doctors in these parts, and I grew worse until I wrote to you and began using your 'Favorite Prescription.' I used three bottles of it and two of the 'Golden Medical Discovery,' also one and a half bottles of the 'Purgative Pellets.' I can do my work and sew and walk all I care to, and am in better health than I ever expected to be in this world again. I owe it all to your wonderful medicines."

Well as I Ever Was.—MRS. JOHN STEWART, of Chippewa Falls, Wis., writes: "I wish to inform you that I am as well as I ever was, for which I thank your medicines. I took four bottles of the 'Favorite Prescription' and one bottle of your 'Discovery' and four bottles of the 'Pellets.' All of the bad symptoms have disappeared. I do all my own work: am able to be on my feet all day. My friends tell me I never looked so well."

Some School Studies.

A teacher had a small class in easy physiology. They had several lessons on the ear, and had been thoroughly drilled on the names and uses of all its parts, so that when some visitors dropped in the teacher was glad it happened to be the hour for this class to recite. After asking several questions and receiving prompt and correct answers, she said: "What is the name of the canal in the ear?" The child hesitated a moment and then spoke up loud and plain: "The Erie canal." Another teacher asked one of her scholars the meaning of the word "vicissitude." "Change," was the reply. "That's right," said the teacher, "now give me a sentence with the word vicissitude in it." "My mother sent me to the store to vicissitude a dollar bill."—Detroit Free Press.

Sure Pop.

Polson's NERVILINE, the great pain cure, is sure pop every time. No need to spend a large sum to get prompt relief from every kind of pain, for 10 cents will purchase a trial bottle. Go to any drug store for it. Large bottles only 25 cents, at all druggists. Nerviline the pain king, cures cramps, headache, neuralgia. An aching tooth, filled with batting saturated with Nerviline, will cease aching within five minutes. Try Nerviline for all kinds of pain. 10 and 25 c. a bottle.

Danger of Familiarity.

A young man ought not to propose too gracefully. If he does the girl may get the idea that he has had more practice than she deems desirable.—San Bernardino Index.

Detectives Wanted,

London's Great Growth.

The growth of London, England, is something marvellous. A recent article in Chambers' Journal states that within the metropolitan police district, an area of 688 square miles, exclusive of the city proper, there is a population of 5,360,000, that the number of police is 13,800 and that during the year 1886 12,252 new houses were built, making twenty-nine miles of new streets.

Mummies Made to Order.

A gentleman who has just returned from an extended foreign tour was asked yesterday why he had not brought home from Egypt, among other curios, a mummy. He said there was a great deal of fraud in the mummy business. Persons purchasing mummies, of course, like to get them as well preserved and natural-looking as possible, and these are found generally in a more or less dilapidated condition, venders having engaged in the manufacture of bogus mummies. They bargain with tramps, beggars and such people for their defunct carcasses, paying therefor a sum sufficient to make their remaining days short and sweet. These fellows are preserved and pickled and then smoked till they are good imitations of the genuine mummy. Whole rows of these articles can be seen in smoke-houses at once. When sufficiently dry they are wrapped in mummy-cloth and sold, to Americans chiefly, bringing a high price.—Portland Oregonian.

What Ails You?

Do you have obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges from head and throat, sometimes profuse, arid and watery, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody, putrid and offensive; dull, heavy headache most of the time, with occasional "splitting headaches"; are your eyes weak, watery, or inflamed; is there ringing in the ears, with more or less deafness; do you have to hack, cough and gag in your efforts to clear your throat in the morning; do you expectorate offensive matter, scabs from ulcers, perhaps tinged with blood; is your voice changed and is there a "nasal twang" to it; is your breath offensive; are your senses of taste and smell impaired? If you have all or any considerable number of these symptoms you are suffering from that most common and dangerous of maladies—chronic nasal catarrh. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, which is sold by druggists at only 50 cents, will cure it. The manufacturers of this wonderful remedy offer, in good faith, $500 for a case of this disease they cannot cure.

OUR EDITOR.

By the time this issue of the ADVANCE gets into the sunshine our esteemed Editor will be home again. Voicing very many of its readers this article is to say welcome home to him. In this word there may possibly be a few readers who do not heartily join for the simple reason that a newspaper is to them a newspaper and it is nothing more. They never reflect for a moment on the mind and heart and energy that it takes to run a weekly journal on really respectable lines. They regard it as a mere automatic production. They pay for it just as they pay for a day's work by an unskilled laborer. With the majority of the ADVANCE readers it is happily otherwise. When its Editor addresses them as "beloved readers" he touches a sympathetic chord that responds in the tone of true, quiet, growing appreciation.

We are glad that our Editor was sent to conference. The choice was well made. If it is an honor to go he deserved it, if a duty he was well qualified to perform it. We rejoice, too, that he has been able to take his annual holiday. The enjoyment thereof was honestly earned and his readers will all be benefitted; for he will return to his work reinterested, rested and recuperated.

We need to use Greek lenses to discover the full significance of that word Editor. It simply means builder. And it does not need any classical culture, but only common sense to perceive that a true Editor is in the truest sense a builder. He builds idea upon idea, fact upon fact, column upon column, issue upon issue and volume upon volume until a living pyramid is reared.

An Editor builds the out look tower. For their own protection the ancients built a city wall and on that wall a tower and in that tower a watchman lived, and from the humming hive below he still heard the call "watchman what of the night." City walls are now the relics of bygone days. Material defences are rather out of date. "The pen is mightier than the sword." Our city wall is civilization, our watchman is an Editor. Through days of glad sunshine we consult him and through nights of long depression we still raise the cry "watchman what of the night?"

The Editor builds largely the meat of commerce. By his clear set, well arranged advertisements he keeps an ever open market in good order. He benefits buyer and seller alike by introducing them to each other. He saves the time, strength and money of his readers by telling them how, where, when and what to buy. An Editor does much toward building the general character of his constituency. Complaining, comparing, suggesting, unmasking abuses and upholding ideals he can and does exert an influence of which few men are fully aware.

For over seven years our Editor has been building in our midst making his own brick and finding his own straw. He is a better workman and has better tools now than ever before. The example of continuity set by him is certainly a good stone in our social edifice. Our district does not want men of the mosquito tribe who come only when the weather is fine and buz and bite and disappear. It wants men that will take root and live and grow and hold on through storm and sunshine.

Let our Editor know that we appreciate him. If we speak a complaint sometimes it is not from murmuring or dissatisfaction but only from a desire to see him attain to all the good there is in him and exert all the influence of which he is capable. Perhaps he gives offence sometimes, but we know he never does so intentionally and is ever the first to grieve if anyones feelings are hurt. Perhaps on some occasions he uses complimentary adjectives a little extravagantly; but then of course he knows that Editors oil is often more effectual than printers ink. We miss him. His block of property looks desolate. As is the body when the spirit is gone such is the house when the family is away. Will the Editor, his wife and daughter accept our congratulations and believe that he is really welcomed home again by his

From our own Correspondent.

One night last week a man from the neighborhood of Epping, who had indulged rather freely in wine-bibbing conviviality, started for home rather late, and having crossed the bridge and proceeded a short distance beyond, lost his way and managed to break his rig. Being now unable to proceed farther, he secured his horses, lay down and spent the night on the roadside. Next day he returned and having got sundry repairs done, started for home again about noon. I think this should be a lesson to him and that he should try and profit by it in future.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers, there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething is pleasant to the taste, and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and call for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and take no other kind.

To Assist Nature

In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.

Soothes and Heals

L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."

Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with

Lung Trouble.

For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RESTORER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, restlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. Lubon's Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

Correspondence of The Advance.

We had a heavy rain here which was much needed.

Mr. James T. Wilson who had his barn burnt two weeks ago is going to erect a new one with stone foundation like a true farmer would do. He has let the framing to A. McLeod and the stonework to the Acles Bros., all who are considered good workmen.

There was a regular field fight took place at the east end of Muddy Valley a few days ago in which there was one seriously wounded and another slightly with stones, as that was their principal weapon. When they came to close quarters they used their fists, but there was not much scientific boxing done but they fought bravely. One of the combatants made a kick at his assailant but being a little near sighted he did not judge the distance very well, therefore he missed his mark and the ponderous boot went up until the stiffness of the hip would not allow it to go any further and the sudden shock knocked himself down. If John L. Sullivan ever comes around this way we will match one of our pugilists with him if he will fight according to the Proton prize ring rules. It is to be hoped they will conduct themselves better in the future as I do not wish to write any more on a subject like this as it is confusing to the intellect.

Mr. Tridham, cattle buyer, of Harriston, and his wife was up on a visit at Mr. Blakeston's.

Mr. Farquer McKinnon, of Clinburgh, is up visiting his sister who lives at John McDonalds. We hope he will have a pleasant time as he intends remaining here two or three weeks.

Mr. Alex. McDonald has been ailing for some time with a lame back. We are glad to hear he is able to work again.

There was some talk of the mormons putting in their apperance again at Joe Campbell's, their old stand, but they did not come. We think they won't trouble themselves any more with the poor sinners in this settlement.

Miss Margaret Nickel, of Mount Forest, was visiting at Mr. Blakeston's.

Eugenia.

From our own Correspondent.

Eugenia has been favored with a few visiters lately who come to visit friends and admire the scenery around the hills.

Mr. Valentine Day and Mrs. Day of Mariposa, have been spending a few days at Mr. Samuel Perkins, at Summer Hill. They admire this part of the country.

Mr. J. W. [illegible] has been [illegible] farmers is free.

[illegible] and Mrs. Brown [illegible]

Mr. [illegible] and some Lochiel [illegible] at Mr. James H. Stoneman's. They had a good time, going to Cedar Creek, viewing the scenery around Eugenia. There is any quantity of the beautiful snow lying in the caves yet. Any one wanting to get a snow ball in June can find one there.

Fishing is the order of the day in the Beaver River. Around Eugenia at present the fish stories are wonderful. They say the trout if they are not

Our energetic police school trustees have erected a fine, substantial six foot fence around the spacious school grounds here. Now is the time to further beautify the grounds by planting evergreens, &c.

Our respected townsman, Mr. D. McLean, has built for himself a nice, snug residence up on the "heights." Mr. McLean is widely known, both for his good fitting boots and his amusing and instructive addresses on the public platform. Long may you live, friend McLean!

We notice the increasing demand for that good bread Al. Watson makes.

G. W. Tryon is rushing the meat business. He keeps a salesman on the road every day.

Mr. T. Ferguson is highly commended for his thorough-bred stock. The sire animals of his Durham cattle, Berkshire swine and fine wool sheep are good.

Mr. W. Watson, sr., is in Owen Sound this week on the Grand Jury.

Mrs. J. C. McInnes, of Cheboygan Mich., is visiting friends here.

Luxuriant Hair

Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.

Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.

Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."

A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.

The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

THE QUEEN'S BALL.

Magnificent Costumes Displayed by Titled Ladies at the Latest State Gathering.

A London cable says: The first state ball of the season last evening was numerously attended. In the absence of the Queen the Prince and Princess of Wales received the guests. The dresses in the large and stately apartments of the fine old palace were seen to the best possible advantage. Myriads of lights were reflected with wonderful effect from many mirrors and a profusion of flowers arranged in banks and masses formed a delightful foreground to a miniature forest of trees, ferns, palms and tall plants with varied and vivid hued foliage. As for the dancers, they looked like a fairy kaleidoscope, in which all the beautiful pieces kept up measure and rhythmical motion, each bright and delicate color identifying itself with a human form and face. Only in the pauses of the dances could the details of dress be observed.

Among the grand display of toilets I mention two. The Marchioness of Lansdowne, who made her re-entree in London society, wore a broadly striped silk and satin of pure gleaming white, rendered still more effective by having a silk stripe subtly interwoven with glittering silver, which shone like diamond dust scattered over snow. The front of the gown was a soft mass of white mousseline de chiffon, cut out at the edges and embroidered with white silk. The embroidery was cleverly arranged so as to fall at the edge of the skirt over a thick ruche of cut out white silk, and to form a fascinating coquille up the left side. The bodice was of striped material, the berthe being of mousseline de chiffon, which goes into clinging and incomparably soft and becoming folds.

Lady Mandeville wore a dress of bright daffodil yellow satin and tulle. It was most effectively trimmed with antique gold lace, dotted over with tiny glittering spangles of polished gold. It was observed that diamonds were more worn than pearls. Jewels have come into fashion again this year. Many dress bodices were dotted over the front with diamond clasps, star and other devices. Diamond necklaces, pendants, bracelets, and tiaras were numerous and in several cases sprays and single stones held in position the folds of the drapery of skirts, more especially where lace was used. There was much latitude in the matter of sleeves, some consisting of a knot of ribbon and a rosebud, while others were compose d of lace tulle or lisse. Pearl and bead trimmings were lavishly used on both skirts and bodices, but galloons of gold or silver guaze were even more largely introduced as trimmings.

The Grand Duchess Valdimir gave a ball at St. Petersburg to celebrate the 20th anniversary of the birthday of the Czarevitch, at which all the ladies appeared in white and all the gentlemen in red. The Empress was in white satin embroidered in gold and she literally blazed with diamonds from head to foot. Most of the company wore fancy dresses, the hostess being arrayed in a picturesque English costume of the time of Queen Elizabeth with a profusion of diamonds and pearls. There were also some magnificent Eastern costumes.

SENSATION AT LOUISVILLE.

Temperance Apostle Murphy's Son John Elopes with a Society Belle.

A Louisville, Ky., despatch says: Society here is stirred by the elopement Tuesday night of one of its gayest and prettiest girls with John Murphy, the 21-year-old son of Francis Murphy, the temperance lecturer. The lady is Miss Lucy, second daughter of Lawrence Richardson, President of the old Kentucky Woolen Mills, and one of Louisville's wealthiest citizens. She is 19 years old and her debut fourteen months ago was all that wealth lavished upon youth and beauty could make it. She became acquainted with Murphy during the recent temperance meetings here and within a month they were engaged. Francis Murphy arrived here on Monday on his way home to Pittsburg, and stopped over a day at the Galt House. That night Miss Richardson took tea with a friend at the hotel and met her affianced, apparently by chance. By arrangements then made they went to Jacksonville on Tuesday night and were married. When the Richardsons heard of it, to avoid talk, the young couple were taken in hand by the bride's brother and remarried by the Rev. C. R. Hemphill, pastor of her father's church. They left at once for a trip east. Francis Murphy says he knew of the engagement and thought Mr. Richardson consented. He himself was strongly opposed to the marriage now, because the young man had no settled business. Neither he nor his wife was present at either ceremony.

A Twin Party.

A novelty in the way of entertainments was a twin party, which was given in St. Louis one evening last week. It was a gathering of twins, old and young, to enjoy themselves. It was devised by the Morrill twins, young men of 21, the sons of a former Baptist clergyman of St. Louis, and who are to enter the Theological School at Rochester this week. There were fourteen pairs present. A musical and literary programme of exercises was rendered exclusively by twins, but one of the most interesting features was the recital of anecdotes regarding the confusion and mistakes that have been caused by the similarity of twins.

The Bride's Name was Anna!

I heard a lovely story the other day of a wedding which took place in South Africa. The bride's little Sunday school scholars came to witness the ceremony, and clustered around the door to witness the arrival of the guests. When the bride's mother arrived, resplendent in satin and lace, they evidently thought that some demonstration was due from them, and summoning to their aid their courage and their Bible teaching, they gave a big shout of "Hosanna! Hosanna!" I am afraid they failed to perceive why they were promptly suppressed.—London Figaro.

A Loss to History.

The recent fire at the office of the Aberdeen Journal was most disastrous, as the files for more than one hundred years were destroyed, and they contained a complete chronicle of all the events that have occurred in Scotland during that period. The first volume contained a long "personal narrative" of the rebellion of 1745-6.

DARING TRAIN ROBBERS.

Desperate Fight Between Thieves and Train Men—Two of the Railway Men Fatally Injured.

A Cincinnati despatch says: At 11 o'clock last night a daring attempt was made to rob the "Big four" train which left Indianapolis early in the evening. The train stopped at Delhi, a small station about eight miles from here, and when about a mile further on its way and running quite slowly five men jumped on board. Three of them boarded the baggage car and two entered the cab of the locomotive. The baggagemaster, Joseph Kitcham, tried to eject them. The three men jumped upon him, but he fought to save the valuables in the car. Suddenly there were five shots and Ketcham fell to the floor of the car. In the cab of the engine the two other robbers were meantime battling with Engineer James Boyd and his fireman, who were trying to compel them to jump off. There was a pitched battle, in which the robbers were beaten off the engine. Conductor Wm. Lefer was also attacked by the ruffians. He rushed into the baggage car just as the robbers were preparing to rifle the car. There was another fight, in which the robbers were put off the train. The engineer had by this time stopped the train. On arrival here Conductor Lefer notified the police.

At midnight a special train was made up and twenty-five men in charge of Chief Gill went to the scene of the robbery. The citizens of Delhi, armed with all kinds of weapons, are searching the woods for the desperadoes. At 12.30 Sheriff Scott and a posse of men left for Delhi. When the train arrived in this city Dr. Muscraft was on hand and examined Ketcham. He is shot twice in the stomach and once in the back of the head. He cannot live. Engineer Boyd is also seriously injured. The back of his head was beat into a pulp with the butt end of a revolver. It is feared he cannot recover.

H. J. Zimmerman, the express messenger, says the men were expert robbers. He says their pistols were of large calibre, and that they seemed cool and courageous. The appearance of the baggage car indicates a desperate struggle between Ketcham and his three assailants. His lantern was smashed and he had evidently fought courageously. The railway company will offer a large reward for the arrest of the robbers. There was only $1,000 in express packages on the train, and the robbers could have no particular motive except the general robbery of the passengers and train men.

Rev. Donald Cook, in Dundee Presbytery, while declaring himself against pecuniary compensation to the publicans, suggested that there ought to be a time compensation. He would give a fair limit of years, five or ten, in which to wind up the concern and realize the goodwill.

A Remarkable Voyage.

A San Francisco, Cal., despatch says: The British bark Balaklava arrived yesterday from London after a remarkably long voyage of one year and seventy four days. Her misfortunes were many. There is not a sailor aboard who shipped on her from England. Ten sailors were washed overboard and drowned in a storm off Cape Horn. While at Valparaiso for repairs the remainder of the crew deserted. The bark was again caught in a storm after leaving the port and lost two more men.

Not So Very Sudden After All.

Miss Gladys—You appeared very abruptly with your errand a while ago. You must not come so suddenly into the room when Mr. Smithers is spending the evening with me. Bridget—Sudden! And is it suddenly ye call it, and me at the kayhole a full three-quarters of an hour!—Harper's Bazar

THE COACHMAN AGAIN.

Another Young Heiress Marries Her Groom.

On a recent morning a cab stopped at Brown's Bar, Leamington, and a highly dressed woman of 25, carrying a bunch of gardenais and maidenhair fern, accompanied by a groom, stepped out and walked to the office of the Superintendent Registrar of Marriages, where they were "made one" by special license. The bridegroom signed himself James Albert Levey, groom, Cubbington, and the bride described herself as the daughter of Hanbury Williams, a large landed proprietor at Abergavenny.

Mr. Williams visited Leamington to find to his dismay that he was too late to prevent the wedding. He discovered some time ago that his daughter (who was an heiress in her own right) was unusually fond of her groom. Levey had been in his employ for about twelve months, and apparently won the affections of his mistress in a very short time, for love passages had been noticed betwen them for six or seven months. To separate the two and put an end, as he thought, to the affair, Mr. Williams sent his daughter to some relatives in Devonshire. It does not appear that he told his relatives the story of his daughter's love-making.

Almost as soon as Levey found out that his sweetheart had been removed he received a letter from her informing him of her whereabouts, and suggesting a plan of campaign. Levey left Abergavenny and presented himself to the lady's relatives as a cousin of Miss Williams. They suspected nothing and allowed the lovers full liberty. An elopement was then arranged. Levey paid a quiet visit to the house; Miss Williams threw her portmanteau to him from the window and then joined him, and took the first train to Leamington,

The bride owns a large estate in North Wales and inherits a good sum in the funds. Levey is a dapper young man, about 20 years of age, and nearly two inches shorter than his wife.—Manchester Courier.

A very painful tragedy occurred on the 26th ult. on the Clare coast. While a farmer named Lynch and his son and daughter, and another farmer named O'Dea and his son, were gathering seaweed on the shore, a great tidal wave rushed upon them and carried them away.

On the 19th ult. a daring bank robbery was committed in Dublin. Mr. Douglas, a city merchant, was about to lodge a deposit at the Royal Bank in notes and gold, when he was asked, by one of two men standing by, the way to the Hibernian Bank. He directed the men to the locality, and turning round, missed the large sum he had placed on the counter. He immediately gave the alarm, but the thief had escaped.

One of the Pests of India.

I watched a child of about 2 and a half years enjoying a crust of bread. There was about it a swarm of flies, and I do not exaggerate when I say two or three dozen were on its face at one time in patches as big as a half dollar, about the eyes and mouth. It would screw up its eyes when they threatened to go in. I thought some must have gone into its mouth with the bread. It did not seem at all annoyed. I saw a sleeping child on the street whose face was almost black with the insects. It smiled as if angels were whispering in its ears. I have seen men talking pleasantly together while a dozen flies would be promenading about their faces, apparently unnoticed by the owners of the faces. I asked a man how he could stand it. "Mashallah! They don't bother me," was the reply. This has made the fly bold, and he seems unable to understand what a foreigner means when he tries to drive him off. He has, too, remarkable prehensile claws, and keeps them keen and sharp when taking constitutional walks over European countenances. It was probably the knowledge of this quality which made these people pronounce it bad luck to drive them off. They found it best to educate the masses to bear the infliction and get used to it. Nearly all the religious and semi-religious prohibitions and usages of the people of the world probably had their origin in some material benefit. The cow was hard to raise in India. The cow was most necessary, so the wise priesthood made her sacred and thus preserved her. Hogs' flesh was subject to diseases in Egypt and Syria, so the hog was made religiously unclean and infested with devils.—Carter Harrison in the Chicago Mail.

On All Fools' Day a New Orleans newspaper printed a detailed and interesting account of a remarkable pocket telephone that had been invented by a young electrician in that city. The article, although written entirely as a joke, found its way as serious matter into the columns of several highly respectable scientific journals, and a number of wealthy corporatians wrote to agents in the city authorizing them to begin negotiations for the purchase of the invention.

EXPEDIENTS FOR PRESERVING BEAUTY.

(Cousin Kate's Weekly Contribution.)

How to Keep a Pretty Mouth.

Red lips are the announcement of good health and good health is the fashion. Women who have very determined wills frequently get into the bad habit of drawing their lips together in a way they think expresses determination; the lips are very pliable and naturally assume the position which is oftenest given to them, so she who feels on pleasant terms with the world at large, who makes it a point only to say pleasant things, will have about her mouth that something that the French call riante—the look that tells of a laugh without the sound, and a smile that is not a smirk. With all his gallantry it took a Frenchman to say this: "To be beautiful a woman must not talk much or she will contract her mouth in an unbecoming manner."

Beauty in Wedding Costumes.

At a recent wedding the wedding gown was of pale tilleul, softened into a lovely shade by the large white tulle veil which covered the bride from head to foot. The bridesmaids wore costumes of white Corah silk, trimmed with pale green ribbon mixed with dark green velvet, and their hats were of drawn white silk, turned up with the velvet, and trimmed with a few loops of pale green ribbon arranged among a cluster of white lilac. Several youthful brides' gowns, intended for wear in June, have been made of white muslin and lace, with short train of rich satin or silk, arranged as a sash, in the full width of the material. But, as a rule, they are of extremely rich silken fabric, very long, and often elaborately trimmed with lace or with drapery of silk crepe or fancy gauze.

Paris Summer Styles.

A cablegram from Paris says: The latest fashion for bridal dresses is a canova robe, plain straight princess dress of white moire. The front breadth is open up to the waist and the satin or tulle jupe is either a mass of lace, rouge and myrtle blossoms or silver and pearl embroidery. In any case the petticoat must not be seen. It must only be suspended. With these plain robes real lace veils are considered to be proper, and diamond pins are used even here where simplicity is observed on this eventful day.

Flannel dresses are coming out again this season. At a garden party given this week by the Princess De Sagan she wore a white, orange and blue striped flannel over a lace petticoat. The outside cost but a few francs, but the jupe was a dream of Irish point. Lawn tennis was the attraction of the day, and this toilet was for that game.

Short, plain skirts with slight drapery are worn with half-fitting jackets open in front. Under these is the foulard or surah chemisette. A more serviceable fashion was never invented. Plain straw hats, with large windmill bows, complete this sensible outfit.

Tosca cane sunshades are beginning to appear here, with less admiration than in London, however, although entirely of French directoire creation. They require a tall, slight figure, and the Parisienne rarely makes a serious mistake in the adoption of a style. Bernhardt has a willowy figure. Moreover, her cane, with its large cross piece Saxon handle, was at once laid aside in the first act. It was merely a suggestion in the picture. She did not attempt to walk about town or to go shopping with it.

Silly Souls.

The latest for the tennis young man is a bracelet. Trousered simpletons have worn the bangle ever since it came in, but the hand bracelet is as new as the Sutro road. Some favored woman is supposed to lock it on some favored man's arm.—San Francisco Report.

The Bath as a Beautifier.

The dread of a dark woman is sallowness if her skin is fair, and greasy coarseness if brunette. Oh, the work and care it is to keep such a woman in training, or she shows the complexion of a cook and a thirty inch waist in a summer. The cure for sallowness is open air, coarse bread and sunshine. For coarseness it is the bread and wheat with plenty of bathing—scrubbing with soap and water twice a week at very least, and underwear changed throughout as often as one bathes. Much is to be said about this changing of body wear, which is next to bathing in importance. I have seen dainty women toss aside cambric and lace, soiled with once wearing in street dust, while they wore the same body suit of cashmere or cotton, by night and day the week through, saturated with the insensible wastes of the skin. If they bathed mid-week the same vest went on again, to return its odors and fluids to the clean, open skin. A clean man or woman should air the person and the inner wear every evening and morning, if the room is warm as it ought to be, or else change undervest and drawers twice or thrice a week. This change and two baths a week are better than daily bathing without it. Perhaps, no change in living shows sooner in the improvement of the complexion. The rough, red, pimply face of youth yields at once to coarse diet, hot soap and water baths and frequent clean undershirts.

"Four Wives the Limit" in Egypt.

Polygamy is in practice everywhere in Egypt. Four wives are the limit. When the man becomes tired of one wife he casts her off and buys another. The four favorites are often seen riding together on a two-wheeled cart, and the poor cast-off creature, barefooted and but half clad, with head uncovered (chastity no longer protected), walking in the rear to serve the younger wives. "Four," say they, "Mohammed taught is all that they can love at one time." The woman has no choice. The man and the father of the woman consummate the contract, and at midnight she is carried to his "harem," not knowing who it is till she enters the den, in which every vestige of womanhood is hopelessly destroyed. Girls marry at 11 years of age, i. e., are sold as wives at that early age, but are then at maturity. Boys are educated in the public schools, girls never. Girls of 11 to 15 years of age are sold to men from 40 to 50 and sometimes upward. They think it is their fate. "It was so to be." It was always so, they are told, and seeing the same state of affairs all about them they cannot feel their degradation as would a woman of a civilized country. Their husbands can beat them, divorce them and still retain and enslave them, and they have no recourse to law nor pity through mercy. Women here work in the fields, carry wood, manure and water; they chop, grub, plough, reap, gather stones for walls, make brick, etc., and are not much with the younger children.—Cairo Letter.

New Devices in Ice-Cream.

There have been some new devices in the way of ice creams, which are novel and interesting. At one grand dinner party a vast rose bush covered with beautiful roses was set upon the table, and the flowers were cut off and one served to each of the guests, the ice-cream being enshrined in the heart of each blossom. Another is a dainty feminine boot in apricot ice. Sometimes the color of the boot is varied to match the hue of the toilet of the lady guest to whom it is served, groselle furnishing the crimson, pistache the pale green, and a new and perfectly innocuous coloring matter called azurine supplying a delicate pale blue. The oddest device is a slice or pate de foie gras, one of which is served to each guest. It is chocolate ice, truffles being simulated by thin slices of liquorice paste, and the surrounding jelly being sweet and flavored with liquor instead of being savory. When well done the deception is perfect.—Paris Cor. St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

The Princess of Wales' Bath.

The Princess of England, whose complexion is not only the finest, but who has best stood the wear and tear of time, takes her morning plunge regularly and in water fairly cold, but she is particularly careful to promptly make use of the flesh-brush, using gloves of moderate roughness rapidly over the surface of the body, and, finally, the rough towel in a quick, general rub, occupying both for the bath and this massage, if one may call it such, twenty minutes in all. At night the same lady's bath is prepared tepid and of distilled water, the admirable advantage of which is not properly understood. Every particle of foreign matter is removed from distilled water, so that it is absolutely pure. It costs about 12 cents per gallon and can be used, a quart at a time, for a quick sponge bath, with admirable effect, especially when combined with a little glycerine and rose water.—Philadelphia Times.

Seasonable Recipes.

Do you use eggs for frosting? Don't do it. Take five tablespoonfuls of milk, one cup of granulated sugar, flavor nicely with lemon or vanilla, then boil five minutes. Beat it hard until it is cool enough to spread on the cake. The beauty of the frosting is that it is ready to cut as soon as thoroughly cold. It is very nice with cocoanut or grated chocolate stirred in it. When eggs are high it is quite a saving.

A compote of fruit may be created of cream, sweetened and whipped until quite stiff, flavored with something delicate in essence, such as rose or vanilla. This is gradually poured in the centre of the fruit, which must be large, as a melon or large oranges. Lastly, the soufflees, fondus, with biscuit. The finger-bowls are placed, and, if ices, are served with the dessert; an ice-plate must be placed on the dolly that covers the dessert-plate. Coffee is served after the ladies retire.

Cream biscuits harmonize perfectly with coffee. Rub one pound of fresh butter into one pound of flour; make a funnel-shaped hole in the centre; into it put half a pound of powdered sugar, upon which the rind of a lemon had been rubbed previously to pounding, and three whole eggs; mix the eggs well with the sugar, and mix all together, forming a flexible paste; cut into round pieces, each nearly as large as a walnut; stamp them flat with a butter stamp of small size, and bake in an oven not too hot.

Blanc Mange.—Take half a dozen bitter almonds and eight or nine ounces of sweet almonds, blanched and peeled; pound them in a mortar with a little orange-flower water; when reduced to a paste add rather less than a pint of milk, pounded loaf sugar to taste, a little more orange-flower water. Strain the mixture through a cloth, squeezing it well, into a basin containing eight or nine sheets of best French gelatine dissolved in a pint of water; mix well, put into a mold set on ice; turn it out just before serving.

A Last Resort.

Landlord—Yes, madam, that house is for rent. Sit down.

Desperate Applicant—Thank you. I have never been so nearly dead in my life. I believe I have walked fifty miles to-day trying to get a house. How much is the rent?

"Only—by the way, madam, have you any children?"

"Um-er—n—o."

"You seem to hesitate about it?"

"Well, the fact is, I have children, but I intend to kill them to-night."

Thought Better of It.

Wife (to husband, who is ostensibly going off for a day's fishing)—Ah, I do hope that you will be successful, John. I see that trout are quoted at $1 a pound.

Husband—No? One dollar a pound! I guess, my dear, I won't try for trout; I hear they are very shy. But you can look out for a nice string of flounders.—Harper's Bazar.

Working on Her Sympathies.

Tender-hearted lady—"You look worn out, poor man, are you ill?" Tramp (sighing heavily)—"I couldn't begin to tell nou, mum, how I have suffered from neurasthenia. But I think I could eat another plate o' them apple dumplin's."

"Enny good butter?" inquired an old lady of the grocer. "There is never any flies on our butter, madam." Then the old lady, whose knowledge of English is limited, said: "Well, if flies won't eat it 'taint good 'nough fer me," and she went across the way where only the choice brands are sold.

The recent Pennsylvania tornado picked up a church steeple, carried it a quarter of a mile, and put it down as squarely as if it had been built there. In the meantime, the rear end of the storm made shingles of the church.

"John," said his wife—they were in a sleeping car berth—"for goodness' sake, wake up!" "Wha-what's the matter?" "You are snoring so people will think we're off the track."

METHODIST CONFERENCE.

The Longley Case Dealt With at Norwich.

The Longley Case.

At 11 o'clock the Conference resolved itself into special session for the consideration of the Longley case.

Rev. James Gray had charge of the prosecution, and Rev. E. A. Stafford of the defence.

All the charges, evidence, documents, etc., were read in open conference by the Secretary and Rev. D. L. Brethour. The whole day was taken up with placing the case before the conference. Various contradictory rumors have gone into the newspapers concerning the whole matter, but the following facts, brought out in the evidence read to-day, may be relied upon as trustworthy: No charges of criminal conduct on the part of Mr. Longley were presented in the charges, and no evidence whatever was brought out to prove anything of the kind. This was distinctly understood by all. There were, however, indiscretions, which Mr. Longley admitted. The interviews at the church and at the Albion Hotel, Toronto, were not denied, but nothing criminally improper took place on either occasion.

MR. LONGLEY'S WRITTEN STATEMENT.

The written statement of Mr. Longley was read, in which he positively stated that he had repeatedly endeavored to free himself from the intimacy and have the interviews cease, but he found himself unable to do so. It had been stated in the public press that Mr. Longley's domestic relations were not happy, and that his wife had threatened to leave him. Not a word was presented in the evidence to substantiate these statements. On the contrary, documents were read which showed that there was no domestic infelicity. In his statements Mr. Longley confesses his weakness, acknowledges that he had acted foolishly, but most positively denies having any criminal relations with the young lady in question. Both seem to have been led almost unconsciously along in their career of infatuation without realizing the folly of the course they were pursuing. Mr. Longley declares that he has most heartily repented of his sin and asked the Divine forgiveness. He had thought of entering into a secular occupation, but still feels called to pursue the work of the ministry, inasmuch as he believes God has forgiven him. He asked the Conference to deal as mildly with him as possible, so that he might be able to pursue his work in another part of the world.

Rev. James Gray addressed the conference, urging the adoption of the resolution of the Toronto District Meeting. He thought the evidence justified such a course.

PLEAS FOR LENIENCY.

Rev. E. A. Stafford made an earnest plea on behalf of Mr. Longley. He admitted the indiscretion of the defendant, but thought it was not sufficiently serious to warrant expulsion. Others who have gone to greater degrees of guilt have been saved from expulsion on account of their penitence and confession. He urged that inasmuch as there was absolutely no evidence to prove criminal conduct, and not even a charge of that kind, expulsion from the Church would be too heavy a penalty. He did not believe that Mr. Longley had deliberately planned and brought about the ruin of the young lady; if he thought so he would not defend him. He had every confidence that Mr. Longley would never again be led into similar acts of folly. He believed him to be a pure-minded, upright man. He thought that the Dominion Church, Ottawa, knowing all the facts of the case, would be willing to accept Mr. Longley as their pastor. In his opinion twenty years of faithful service and correct life ought to count for something. The leading officials of the Dominion Church have expressed their unqualified confidence in Mr. Longley.

Rev. Dr. Burns also spoke strongly in favor of the defendant.

EXPULSION MOVED FOR.

It was then moved that the recommendation of the Toronto district be adopted, thus expelling Mr. Longley from the ministry of the Methodist Church.

It was moved in amendment that Mr. Longley be reprimanded by the chair and permitted to retire without his credentials, which is in substance accepting his resignation.

Shortly after the commencement of the afternoon proceedings the Conference was resolved into a special session for continuing the Longley case. All persons not members of the Conference were asked to retire. Several did so, but a few remained, who had to be specially requested to leave.

Rev. John Wakefield was the first speaker. He was in favor of adopting the recommendation of the Toronto District. Mr. Longley's mistake was not the result of a sudden impulse by which a man might be overtaken in a moment, but it had gradually developed through successive weeks and months. It had been stated that Mr. Longley had not been guilty of criminal relations with the lady in question, but it was a very difficult thing to prove. The interviews, to say the least, were highly improper. He thought the Church, and the families of the Church, should be protected from men who had acted as Mr. Longley had done.

Mr. T. S. Linscott said that Mr. Longley's fault could not be overlooked, but there was such a thing as mercy. It would be a very unkind thing to suppose that the grosser form of sin had been committed. It had not been proved; the prosecution did not even claim this. In civil courts a defendant is always given the benefit of any doubt which might exist. He was in favor of doing this in Mr. Longley's case.

Rev. T. W. Jackson went over the evidence, and urged that deposition from the ministry was the adequate punishment for Mr. Longley's crime.

Rev. Thomas Colling said that while the extreme of guilt had not been proven, the crime of the defendant was such that it merited a very severe punishment. He could not forget the age, ability and experience of Mr. Longley, which very largely deprived him of excuse. He looked at the interests of the Church, and felt it to be his duty to vote for Mr. Longley's expulsion. His repentance had come a little too late.

Rev. John Laycock said that he had come to the Conference greatly prejudiced against Mr. Longley, believing that he deserved the heaviest penalty. After hearing the charges and evidence in the case, he felt greatly relieved, and was of the opinion that mercy suited Mr. Longley's case best. He believed that Mr. Longley had sincerely repented, and in his opinion penitence had not come too late.

Some members of the Conference asked that the discussion be shortened so that delegates might leave on the afternoon train.

MR. LONGLEY'S STATEMENT.

The following is a brief synopsis of his address: "There has been a mistake in regard to the length of time the interviews continued between the young lady and myself. It has been said that it continued for a whole year. I am willing to take my full share of blame in the unfortunate matter. We both glided imperceptibly into the intimacy. There was no premeditated evil intention. I frequently intimated to her the impropriety of the interviews, although I am free to admit that I did not insist upon their immediate discontinuance. At the meeting which took place in the vestry of the church I was strongly advising her to consent to the complete cessation of the intimacy. Just then her mother knocked at the door. This made it necessary to arrange for another interview. I admit that we were both very foolish, but not criminal. The interviews did not take place nearly as frequently as stated. When I went away from Toronto I did not intend to return. I acted upon advice in my course, but I found that it was to my advantage to return and meet my trial. There may seem to be some contradictions between the statements of the young lady and my own, but there is really no collision, although it may look like it. I am here to-day to ask for justice. I do not think it is fair to heap all the blame upon me—I have not been the teacher and leader of the young lady in a career of sin. I am willing to take my share of the blame, but not all. Her word should not be taken as final upon vital points and my word treated as worthless. All sorts of reports have been made, many of them coming from malicious tongues. It is not just that all these should be accepted. I am here to ask, in justice, that the extreme penalty be not visited upon me, because the extreme charge has not even been made. I am here to ask for mercy. I have been sufficiently humbled and crushed to ask for mercy—not for the sake of bolstering up what is left of my reputation, but for the sake of the good I may still be able to do in the calling I love. I sincerely thank my brethren who have stood by me during this severe trial. I shall not refer to my past record of twenty years, but think it ought to count for something. I admit my error; I deserve punishment; and I have been punished already. Had it not been for this unfortunate affair my name would have stood connected with one of the leading churches in this Dominion. My own consciousness of personal sin has been my meat and drink day and night. I must be followed by my wrong-doing. My ministerial life is in your hands. I have no malice against those who have spoken against me. If you entertain my plea for mercy I solemnly promise, in the sight of God, by humility and a correct life, to endeavor to save the erring and the fallen, and thus to show my gratitude to God and to you."

Many of the members of the Conference were visibly affected during the address, and Mr. Longley himself several times choked up with emotion and could not speak for several moments.

The resolution adopting the minute of the Toronto district meeting, which recommended his expulsion from the ministry, was then put and lost, only twelve voting for it.

VERDICT OF THE CONFERENCE.

The following resolution was then moved by Rev. R. W. Woodsworth, seconded by Rev. W. H. Laird: "That having heard all the evidence in the case of Rev. B. Longley, we deeply deplore the glaring inconsistency and sinful folly of his conduct, and hereby adjudge that he be suspended from the ministry of the Methodist Church for a period of one year. And we earnestly pray that the fruits of a repentance, which we are glad to recognize as sincere and genuine, may henceforth be manifested in a consistent and holy life."

This resolution was carried by a vote of 56 to 40. Rev. Mr. Calvert's motion was therefore not voted on.

The Conference then adjourned.

WEDDED IN SIX WORDS.

What is Regarded as the Quickest Marriage on Record.

"One of the quickest marriages I ever heard of," said a talkative man to a Chicago Mail reporter, "was performed by Rev. Dr. Aaron Turner, now in the Minnesota Conference." Then the talkative fellow talked on in this lively strain:

"Dr. Turner was in charge of the Vincennes circuit at the time. One evening he was hurrying his toilet in preparation for a marriage that he was to perform at 8 o'clock at the home of one of his flock. He was late and very much afraid that he couldn't reach the place of appointment in time. Just as he got his white tie adjusted and was getting himself into his coat a knock was heard on the parsonage door. Dr. Turner took up his hat, stepped to the door and opened it. A young man stood outside. Dr. Turner asked his business. The young man was flurried, but he managed to say that he wanted to get married, and handed the parson a marriage license.

"Well," said Dr. Turner, "I can't do it to-night. I am hurrying now to perform another ceremony. I'm already late."

"But," pleaded the young man, "it won't take long."

"I know, but I can't wait." And the preacher came out and closed the door, walking rapidly a

"But, Mr. Turner," called the young man, desperately, and he ran after the minister, "you surely can marry us. It won't take you but a minute."

"Where's the lady?"

"Right back here," and the young man pointed to a figure standing in the shadow of a tree.

"Well, come on," Dr. Turner said, and the two went back to where the girl stood.

"Is this the woman you want to marry?"

"Yes," said the young man.

"Then you are man and wife. Good night." And away he went, leaving the pair standing speechless. It was a minute before the newly made husband recovered enough to run after the preacher, who was rapidly disappearing in the dark.

"Mr. Turner! Mr. Turner!" he cried.

"Well, what is it?" said the preacher, pausing.

"Why, was that all? Will that do?"

"Yes, yes, that will do. You are just as much married as if I'd gone through a yard of ceremony. Good night. And again he hurried away, reaching his appointment just in the nick of time.

The young man went slowly back to the bride and spent the next hour or two in satisfying her that she was really married.

Temperance Notes.

New Zealand rejoices in the fact that there is not a distillery within its borders.

Great Britain has 15,000 temperance organizations.

Atlanta, Ga., has a prohibition club with 2,000 members.

An association for the suppression of impure literature has been formed by some women of Paris.

According to the Chicago Inter-Ocean, the criminal courts daily more thoroughly establish the intimacy between liquor and lunacy.

During the past year over 200 members have been added to the W.C.T.U. Unions of Utah, 75 to the young people's societies and over 600 to the Loyal Temperance Legions. The work has been presented before the Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational associations, many short addresses given before schools and Sunday schools and over 20,000 pages of literature distributed.

"I cannot understand the English people," said the late Rajah of Travancore. "They say it is very wrong to send opium to China, to demoralize the Chinese. But is it not also a very wicked thing to encourage the sale of intoxicating liquor in India for the sake of revenue? Is it not just as criminal to degrade Hindoos as it is to degrade Chinamen? Why is it not as wrong to send brandy and whiskey to Calcutta as to send opium to Shanghai or Hong Kong?"

The Washingtonian Monthly, the organ of the Washingtonian Home, Chicago, thus sets forth the principles upon which the treatment of patients admitted to that institution is based: "The four cardinal rules that are taught in the lectures to the inmates of the home as necessary to a complete restoration of the physical needs of the body from the whiskey habit are: Total abstinence, nutritious food (hygienically used), sleep and cheerfulness. Add to the above a total abstaining from narcotics of all kinds, and a thorough moral development and the battle is comparatively easy—in fact there is no battle to fight. This is a pointer for those outside of reformatory institutions to reform themselves, permanently, if they will."

For many months a large and influential committee of representatives, who number among them members of Parliament, as well as delegates from missionary, temperance and other philanthropic societies, has been sitting in London to investigate the question of the destruction which for so long has been going on among the native races in almost all parts of the world, owing to the importation of ardent spirits distilled in Europe. The amount of evidence tending to prove the extent of the evil before the committee is terribly significant, and proves that upon France, Germany, Great Britain, Holland, Portugal and Sweden lies the grave responsibility of pandering to the naturally morbid craving for spirits in Africa and other lands. To such an alarming extent has this increased of late that in some remarkable cases the African natives themselves have petitioned that the import of spirits may be stopped, inasmuch as the annihilation of their tribes is inevitable if it continues.

OLD-TIME SCIENCE.

Some Natural History, of the Fabulous Order, of Former Generations.

The "Speculum Mundi; or, a Glass Representing the Face of the World," which was published in 1670, before the advent of real science, contains some very curious statements in natural history, says the Popular Science Monthly. "The bigness of the whales," it says, "equalizeth the hills and mighty mountains." Indeed, some authors mention "far greater whales than these." Above all others, mermen and mermaids are considered "the most strange fish in the waters." A fine specimen of mermaid, which was said to have been caught in Holland, "suffered herself to be clothed, fed with bread, milk and other meats, and would often strive to steal again into the sea, but being carefully watched she could not. Moreover, she learned to spin and perform other petty offices of women; but at the first they cleansed her of the sea-moss which did stick about her." The ostrich is said to be compounded, as it were, of a bird and a beast. For making a drunkard loathe his liquor a prescription is given for breaking owls' eggs and putting them into it. Birds of Paradise "have no wings, neither do they fly, but are borne up into the air by the subtility of their plumes and lightness of their body." The unicorn is described as being like a two-year-old colt, with a horn growing out of his forehead, "a very rich one, being a horn of such virtue as is in no beast's horns besides, which, while some have gone about to deny they have secretly blinded the eyes of the world from their full view of the greatness of God's great works." The gorgon is a "fearful and terrible beast to look upon. He causeth his mane to stand upright, and, gaping wide, he sendeth forth a horrible and filthy breath, which infecteth and poisoneth the air." The cockatrice or basilisk is called the king of serpents, not only on account of his size, but also "for his stately pace and magnanimous mind." His poison scorches the grass as if it were burned. The "beams" of his eye will kill a man. The dragon is found chiefly in India and Ethiopia. "His wings will carry him to seek his prey when and where occasion serveth." His teeth are very sharp and set like a saw, but his prodigious strength "resteth in his tail." The amphisbena has two heads and no tail, "having a head at both ends." Africa "aboundeth" with them.

Cremating the King's Sons.

From Siam we learn that the cremation of the two sons of the king, which was "celebrated at the end of February, was a ceremony eclipsing in magnificance even that of the king's uncle, whose body was cremated last year." On that occasion the chief features of the proceedings were illustrated in a London pictorial weekly, but the present occasion seems to have passed unnoticed. For fifteen days Bangkok was given up to revelry. No work was done, and such amusements as fireworks, illuminations and interminable dramatic performances were provided nightly and kept up till 2 or 3 o'clock a.m. The building in which the cremation was effected had been erected at a cost exceeding 50,000 pounds sterling, a fact which, as it is now being demolished as having served its purpose, shows munificence, if not extravagance. Externally this "premane" presented the appearance of a palace of gold, so gorgeous was its ornamentation; and internally its chief feature was the electric light with which it was illumined throughout. There were two separate cremation days during the fortnight, and the final procession for each was so long that it occupied over an hour in passing a fixed point. Siamese funerals may be expensive ceremonies, but at least they cannot be called lugubrious.—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The Land of Little People."

The following poem appears in a volume of verse by Mr. Cooper Willis, entitled "Tales and Legends in Verse." It is an answer to a poem of Mr. Weatherly on the same subject.

Yes; the land of little people is a lovelier land than ours.
With its mine of new-found treasures, mossy glades, and fairy bowers;
Earth her robe of choicest beauty spreads to woo the tender feet,
And the angels whispering round them thrill the air with accents sweet.
Memory brings no pang of sorrow, troubles lightly pass away,
Hope's horizon is to-morrow, and the sun is bright to-day;
Every moment has its blessings, sweeter thoughts and fairer flowers.
Yes; the land of little people is a lovelier land than ours.

But from o'er the silent river comes to us a purer glow—
Purer even than the sunbeams that the little people know;
And the love-song of the heavens steals upon the wearied ear,
Sweeter than the angels' whispers that the little people hear;
And the wanderer, overstriven, humbled as a little child,
Knows the past is all forgiven, and his God is reconciled,
When around his faltering footsteps comes the blessing of the dove,
From the fairest world of any, from the home of peace and love.

Getting the Drop on a Burglar.

A well known young man of this city, who will recognize himself as the hero of this thrilling tale, a few days ago shot and mortally wounded a large and expensive pier glass in his father's parlor. He came in very late (after an unsuccessful effort to unlock the front door with his umbrella) through an unfastened coal hole in the sidewalk. Coming to himself toward daylight he found himself—spring overcoat, silk hat, "jag" and all—stretched out in the bath-tub. With some little difficulty he reached his room, and was just about to light the gas with his night key, when he heard a suspicious sound on the lower floor. Convinced that it was burglars he wended his somewhat tortuous way to a table near by and took from the drawer his loaded revolver. He made enough noise going downstairs to have announced his coming to a deaf man, but finally reached the parlor door and crept through the doorway on all fours. In the middle of the room he rose to his knees, then to his feet. A dark figure rose simultaneously in front of him. As the young man raised his pistol the morning twilight flashed on a gleaming weapon in the hand of the other. "Hol' on, mic! m' fren!" the young man exclaimed. "I've gic! got sh' drob on you!" The pistols flashed simultaneously; the house rang with a loud report, and a crash of glass followed it. When the startled family reached the spot the brave scion of the house of —— sat on the floor amid the debris carefully examining himself in search of wounds, while a smile of righteous triumph shone in his face. "I bic! brought 'm down!" he murmured. When he discovered that his deadly bullet had obliterated his own reflection in the big parlor mirror his triumph grew beautifully less, and he then and there swore off, "for good and all," he says.—Albany Journal.

Rag-Gatherers of Paris.

There are in Paris more than 30,000 people who make their living out of rag-gathering and burrowing in the ash-bins of the city, and many more who are dependent directly on the rag industry. They are organized and knit together like any co-operative or industrial society, and are divided into two great classes of workers—diurnal and nocturnal.

The nocturnal breed begin to ply their work at about 11 o'clock. They may be seen going from street to street carrying a huge basket on their back, and with a lantern in one hand and an iron hook called a crochet in the other. They walk smartly along the gutter, looking keenly about their feet, and now and then pick up something with the crochet and pitch it into the hotte or basket.

They stop at every dust-box, and, after ransacking it to their heart's content, proceed on to the next. The weaker and younger members of the fraternity work at home. The rag-gathers have regular beats on the streets.

Fell Into a Tub of Boiling Logwood.

A Providence (R.I.) despatch says: Wm. McCann, aged 25, and unmarried, fell head first into a tub of boiling logwood at the Valley Worsted Mill, at Olneyville, yesterday, and was terribly scalded. He was taken to the Rhode Island Hospital in terrible agony. He will die.

Mr. Bradley's Complaint.

Last Saturday E. B. Bradley, teller of the Union National Bank at Chicago, complained of toothache and obtained a leave of absence in order to visit a dentist. When he failed to return and his accounts were found to be falsified, it became evident that Bradley's complaint was tooth in.—Norwich Bulletin.

A Matrimonial Reminiscence.

Brown (of Chicago)—That fellow is looking at you rather hard. Do you know him?

Mrs. Brown—His face does look familiar. What's his name?

Brown—Goldplate, I believe.

Mrs. Brown—Oh, yes; I remember him now. He was my first husband.—Life.

Do You Value Your Health?

"Never go to bed immediately after a hearty supper," says a medical authority. People who are fond of hearty suppers should eat them in the forenoon.—Boston Courier.

At a meeting of physicians in Chicago work was recommended as a remedy for nervous prostration.

The Markdale "Hustlers" played a game of lacrosse with the Meaford "Puzzlers" a week ago last Friday and were beaten by four straights.

About six o'clock on Sunday morning last, at Galbraith's sideroad, a freight train killed a valuable cow belonging to Mr. Arthur White of this place.—[Chatsworth News.

While assisting at a raising last week at Mr. Geo. Mathews', 2nd con. Glenelg, a young man named Abraham Crutcherly fell breaking his leg in two places.—[Durham Chronicle.

A young lad named Mahn had the index finger of his right hand cut off at the second joint a few days ago at the cobinet factory by coming in contact with a circular saw.—[Hanover Post.

A two-year-old son of Mr. Henry Moss, of Egremont, was left alone in the house when his clothing caught on fire while he was playing near the stove. His body and arms were badly burned but he is recovering.

A horse belonging to Mr. Thos Beatty, cooper, of Glenedeu, was found one day last week in a beaver meadow near Ballinafad, nearly out of sight in the mire, where it had died before being discovered.—[Mt. Forest Representative.

One night recently Mr. D. Billing, a farmer in East Luther, was awakened by a racket in the barn-yard, and on rising to ascertain the cause he went to the stable and to his surprise he saw a big black bear make off with a lamb.

Broke His Leg. Mr. Samuel McCutcheon, councillor of Mulmur, met with a severe accident on Thursday last. He was at the raising of a frame building at Mr. Ormsby's when one of the bents fell on him breaking his leg. The fracture is a bad one.—[Shelburne Free Press.

A man named Hayes committed suicide in Owen Sound last Thursday, by drowning. Several persons saw him in the water and attempted to rescue him but he persistently pushed all assistance away from him and was drowned. Probably he was tired of life.—[Chatsworth News.

Buffeted off the Track.—The down train from Owen Sound yesterday came into collision with Mr. McGregor's cow near the grist mill, rolling it over three or four times and then turning it off the track. The cow was rather badly injured but walked on to the commons where it continued feeding.—[Dundalk Herald.

Messrs. Robert White and Robert McKenna, of Mono, got quarreling while going home from Orangeville on Tuesday of last week. They stood up in the waggon and the little boy who accompanied them struck the horses with the whip which made them give a sudden jump throwing White out on his head. He was taken home and Dr. Lewis sent for but nothing could be done to save his life. He died on Friday morning and was buried in the afternoon.

An accident occurred at Blanchard's, on the 11th line, St. Vincent, on Monday last which might have been attended with fatal results. A barn was being raised, and as is usual on such occasions, sides were chosen, and a race was the result. When placing the rafters in position it is said considerable carelessness was manifested, and on two occasions sticks fell to the ground coming dangerously near the workmen engaged below. A third time one of those beneath was not so fortunate. Jos. Baxter was stooping down to lift something from the ground, and when in that position a rafter fell and struck him across the shoulders, knocking him down. In the fall he struck his face against a timber in front of him, cutting a severe gash. A physician was sent for and an examination showed that no bones are broken, but the man is badly bruised, and it will be some time before he can resume work. The escape from instant death seems almost miraculous.—[Meaford Mirror.

The Seaforth Expositor is probably the best country newspaper in Canada. Its circulation is 4,400, and its Editor and Proprietor, Mr. McLean, is one of the most genial members of the Fourth Estate it has been our lot to come in contact with. The Expositor is an eight page, seven column paper, set in solid brevier type, with the exception of the editoral matter which is leaded. The subscription price is $1.50 per year. The mechanical department is a first-class one, under the foremanship of a splendid practical printer, and its presses are run by steam.

The Dress Goods & Hats at Brander's, Priceville, are surprising both in quality and price. They all talk about it.

Salem Sabbath School intends holding a basket picnic on Monday July 9th, in the grove at Lot 32, Con. 9, Artemesia. A good program will be provided and a collection taken up in aid of the school fund. Further particulars next week.—JNO. BENSON, Secretary.

Our brethren of the Fourth Estate will please accept our thanks for their good-natured eulogiums on the occasion of THE ADVANCE entering upon the eighth year of its existence. With few exceptions, our relations with the fraternity during the past seven years have been of a most pleasant character, and we trust there never will be any change in this respect.

A Flesherton boy threw a rotten egg into the much prized and much used Boyne bridge spring on Friday evening last. This is one of the meanest little tricks he ever did, and were it not for the respect we entertain for his friends, his name would appear in full. The spring in question furnishes the water supply for a large number of families in the neighborhood.

Anniversary Services of Chalmers' Church.

The Presbyterian congregation here have secured the services of Rev. W. A. Hunter, M.A., of Orangeville, to preach and conduct the anniversary services of the Presbyterian church here on the second Sabbath in July. Preaching at 11 a.m. and 6:30 p.m.

Garden Party on Dominion Day.

A Garden Party will be held on the grounds of Squire Armstrong, Flesherton, on Monday next, July 2nd, Dominion Day, under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid of the Methodist Church. THE EMPEROR DEAD

SYMPATHY WITH EMPRESS VICTORIA.

THE SCENE AT THE END.

The Life and Achievements of a Popular Prince.

WARRIOR, STATESMAN AND SOVEREIGN.

THE DEAD EMPEROR.

Death came to Emperor Frederick at a comparatively early age for one coming of the long-lived family of the Hohenzollerns. He was born in the New Palace at Potsdam on 18th October, 1831, and he was therefore in his 57th year. In his boyhood he was sickly, but he grew to be a strong and robust young man. In 1857 he attended the opening of the first great International Exhibition in London, which was devised and carried out under the auspices of the Prince Consort. One result of the exhibition which the Queen and the Prince Consort had scarcely foreseen was the betrothal of their daughter Princess Victoria to Prince Frederick William of Prussia. It is obvious from the very cool way in which Prince Albert writes of the event to his friend, Baron Stockmar, that the match was not thought to be a very grand one, though, on the whole, quite satisfactory. Prussia was not the power in 1851 that it is now; and the House of Hohenzollern, now the most illustrious in Europe, was then judged by the pitiful policy of its two last representatives on the throne, who were content to play second fiddle to the Emperor Nicholas of Russia. What appeared to reconcile the bride's father to the marriage was his observation that the young people seemed to like each other and that the young Hohenzollern had "honest eyes and a frank and amiable disposition." It was not until 1855, however, that the engagement was made public, and the way it was received by the English press of that day would scarcely now be credited, if it were not a matter of history. The Times particularly distinguished itself by heaping abuse upon the royal house of Prussia. The wedding was postponed, on account of the extreme youth of the bride, until January 25th, 1858. It took place in the chapel of St. James' Palace, London. After the ceremony Queen Victoria embraced and kissed her daughter and son-in-law, and turned her cheek to the latter's father who had respectfully stooped to kiss her hand. When the young couple embarked at Gravesend in the royal yacht Victoria and Albert, there was an enormous concourse of people, who were wildly cheering, and even the river was covered for miles with boats, from which innumerable handkerchiefs waved a last good-bye to "the fair rose of England." Particularly amusing to the Prince was a homely and disrespectful advice freely imparted by the sailors and Thames boatmen who crowded about the royal yacht. "Be true to her now," one honest fellow called out. "Keep her well," another shouted. "God bless you for it," was the greeting of a third. The railroad journey from Brussels to Berlin was a triumphal progress, full of interesting incidents.

THE WAR WITH AUSTRIA.

As Crown Prince, the late Emperor took part in three great wars—the Danish, Austrian and French. In the first-named, however, he was only a spectator attached to the headquarters of Marshal Wrangel. His first leadership was given to him in the Austrian campaign in 1866. In that war the main thing to do was to prevent the forces of South Germany joining with those of Austria that had been gathered in Bohemia. King William led three separate armies, the first called the Army of Bohemia, 100,000 men, under Prince Frederick Charles; the second, the army of Silesia, 116,000 men, under the Crown Prince; the third, the Army of the Elbe, 40,000 men commanded by Herwarth von Bittenfeld. Moltke's plan was "March separately; strike combined;" and in seven weeks the war was over. On the 23rd of June Prince Frederick Charles crossed the Austrian frontier, and six days later he was joined by the Army of the Elbe. They were at Gittschin. On his left the Crown Prince, with his army, was at Koeniginhof, a day's marchaway, while the Austrians had retired on Koeniggratz, ready for battle. The plan of attack was very simple. Prince Frederick Charles, with his three corps, was to assist Benedeck with his five, while Bittenfeld was to fall upon the left flank of the Austrians and the Crown Prince attack their right. But the Crown Prince was 25 miles away, and it was 4 in the morning before Col. Von Frankenstein, after a terrible ride, arrived at the Crown Prince's headquarters with the King's command to join Prince Frederick Charles. The battle began at 8 o'clock in the morning, the King, Moltke and Bismarck being on the field. The needle gun worked terrible havoc among the devoted battalions of Austria, but they kept their ground, and for a long time the scales of battle hung pretty evenly. For a time it seemed indeed as if victory would rest on the standards of the Hapsburgs, and the Prussians looked for the coming of the Crown Prince as eagerly as Wellington had once looked for the coming of Blucher.

"Would to God the Crown Prince would come!" Suddenly Bismarck lowered his glasses and drew attention to certain lines in the distance. All telescopes were pointed thither. At first the lines were pronounced to be furrows. "They are not furrows," said Bismarck, "the spaces are not equal; they are advancing lines." It was the Crown Prince's army that had been delayed by the condition of the roads, which the rains had made all but impassable. Only twenty-five miles, but it took the army nine hours to do the distance, and the Crown Prince lost 25 per cent. of his men through exhaustion by the way. The Crown Prince lost not a moment in getting his forces into action. Violently assaulted on both flanks, and fiercely pressed in the centre, the Austrians began to slacken their fire, to give way and then to retreat. The battle was won, and the honors of having decided it were the Crown Prince's. Bismarck himself admits how critical was the situation of the Prussians at one point of the battle. After the victory, late in the evening, the Crown Prince met the King, who embraced him affectionately, and decorated him on the field with Prussia's highest military order, "Pour le Merite." That meeting has become as historical as that of Blucher and Wellington.

THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR.

"Unser Fritz's" part in the Franco-German war is almost too well known to bear repetition. As in the Austrian campaign, the German forces were divided into three armies, under the command of General Steinmetz, Prince Frederick Charles and the Crown Prince. Under the Crown Prince's command were the two Bavarian army corps and three Prussian ones, one division of Baden, one of Wurtemberg and two cavalry divisions—over 200,000 men. He had the honor of striking the first blow by falling upon the French at Weissemburg on August 4th, and two days later assaulting MacMahon at Worth and causing the Duke de Magenta's hosts to tumble back partly upon Strasburg and partly upon Chalons. To the Crown Prince was given the duty of pursuing the Duke de Magenta towards Chalons. With him co-operated the Crown Prince of Saxony, at the head of the Fourth Army, and between these two armies marched the royal headquarters. He arrived at Sedan in time to close up the ring formed by the German army on 1st September, and was with the Emperor on the hill when Baron de Raelh, Napoleon's aide-de-camp, arrived with the letter from the Emperor expressing his willingness to surrender his sword. On the following day he assisted at the celebrated meeting with Napoleon at the Chateau de Bellevue. From there he pressed on to Paris, making his headquarters at first at St. Germain and later at the villa "Des Ombrages" at Versailles. "Unser Fritz" was immensely popular with his men, and especially with the Bavarians, and of his popularity many amusing anecdotes are told. After the war the Crown Prince took prominent part in the triumphal entry of the Bavarian troops into Munich, where he was greeted with such immense enthusiasm that King Ludvig was greatly offended, and at the banquet given in the Rathhaus the same night failed to put in an appearance. The young dreamer was already far off on his way to his mountain retreat at Hohenichwangen. The Crown Prince was also present at the triumphal entry of the Prussian troops into Berlin, and sat beside his father, surrounded by the brilliant group of princes and generals who watched the victorious troops passing down the Unter den Linden.

On the death of Kaiser William in March last the Crown Prince succeeded him as Frederick the Third. But for some months before his accession to the throne he himself had been in the shadow of death. It is not necessary to enter into particulars regarding the disease which has proved fatal. Suffice it to say that he bore his sufferings like a hero. In private life the deceased was to all appearances a happy man. His home life, even when in good health, was one of great simplicity. He took a pleasure in receiving artists, litterateurs and savants, even those who were inveterately opposed to him in politics. His own politics were those of a moderate Liberal. He was invariably consulted by Emperor William and the Chancellor in matters of grave importance. The Bismarck policy of peace with France, and which has for its ultimate end the entente cordiale between the two countries, was known to be warmly approved of by him, though it was no secret that he differed from Bismarck with regard to the latter's taste for absolutist methods in home affairs. The deceased showed a greater fondness for travel than for military pageantry, being in this respect totally different from most members of the Hohenzollern family. History presents few figures more melancholy than that of Frederick, ascending the throne in his prime, but with the death-rattle in his throat. "There was a time when his friends imagined a very different career for him," says Max Muller in the Contemporary Review. "They believed that he might succeed to the throne in the very prime of manhood. His father, the late Emperor, then Prince of Prussia, had been the most unpopular man since 1848, and it was considered by no means impossible that he might think it right to decline the crown and to abdicate in favor of his son. The star of Prussia was low in 1848, and it sank lower and lower during the last years of the afflicted king, Frederick William IV. Few people only were aware of the changes that had taken place in the political views of the Prince of Prussia, chiefly during his stay in England, and the best spirits of the time looked upon his son, Prince Frederick William, as the only man who could be trusted to inaugurate a new era in the history of Prussia. His marriage with the Princess Royal of England gave still stronger zest to these hopes, for while he was trusted as likely to realize the national yearnings after a united Germany she was known as the worthy daughter of her father and mother, at that time the only truly constitutional rulers in Europe. England has then the ideal of all German Liberals, and a close political alliance with England was considered the best solution of all European difficulties. Young men, and old men too, dreamt dreams, little knowing how distant their fulfilment should be, and how dashed with sorrow when at last they should come to be fulfilled."

Germany's New Emperor.

"The King is dead! Long live the King!" Crown Prince William succeeds his father; in fact, became Emperor of Germany the moment Emperor Frederick breathed his last. No new occupant of a throne was ever more closely watched than will be Emperor William by the whole civilized world. His figure rises like a dark cloud upon the peace of Europe, ominous of lightning flashes and the reverberations of artillery's thunder. He is more than a Boulanger. A soldier, passionately fond of military exploit, self-willed, forceful, in a moment he assumes power and responsibility so vast that it can hardly be estimated. Picture to yourself a young man in his 30th year, six feet in height, straight as an ash sapling, with finely-formed, slender limbs, narrow hips, swelling chest, and square, broad shoulders, with a smallish head on a long, full-throated neck, held proudly upright, and an oval face, with an aquiline effect of profile, clear-cut, strong chin, bended nose, prominent though not high cheek bones, and good open forehead, with clear, sharp, cold gray blue eyes, light brown hair, close cut behind, but longer on the crown, and rising from the temples to form a sort of ridge from the parting across the brow and a yellowish mustache, loosely curled up at the ends, and you have such a portrait as words can paint of the new German Emperor.

The new Emperor is married to a German Princess, and they have several of a family. He is fond of military life, and has never taken a very prominent part in public affairs. He is a firm believer in the "divine right of Kings."

The New Emperor's Crippled Arm.

A "Former Tutor" writes: Much has been said and written about Prince William's arm that is far from accurate. I had been in the habit of sitting close beside him every day for weeks before I noticed that his arm was in any way different from that of other people. Even then, I only observed it because my attention was called to it by others. Then I perceived that the left arm was always in almost exactly the same attitude, and that the Prince could only move it very slightly, bending it a little up or a little down from its normal position across the body, as though it were fixed in an invisible sling; and that if he wished to use it to steady the sheet of paper on which he was writing, he was obliged to raise it on to the table with the other hand. No doubt this lack of power is a great loss and inconvenience, especially to so ardent a soldier as William, for it compels him, I understand, to ride only horses that have been specially trained for his use, but it is fortunately no disfigurement whatever.

ROASTED HIS FEET.

Masked Robbers Torture an Aged Man to Make Him Give up His Money.

A Pittsburg despatch says: An atrocious outrage is reported from Fairchance, about two miles from Uniontown. Samuel Humbert, an old resident of Fairchance, was assaulted by masked men at his residence at midnight Saturday, and subjected to great tortures to make him disclose where his money was secreted. At that hour Humbert, who lives alone, was aroused by a knock at his door. In response to his inquiries as to who was there, the men outside asked for a drink of water. When the old man opened the door to comply with their request he was seized and gagged. Two ruffians then searched the house, but failed to find anything of value, whereupon they commanded their captive to surrender his money and valuables. He insisted that he had no money. The two fiends then built a fire in the grate, and, drawing the old man up to it, roasted his feet until they were blistered and shockingly burned. Still the old man protested that he had no money, and implored them to release him. They threatened to set the house on fire if he did not confess. After turning everything in the house upside down, and ripping up the carpet in their search for money, they bound the old man hand and foot and departed. Humbert, after a desperate struggle, freed himself and gave the alarm. His neighbors quickly gathered, and organized a search party to hunt the rascals down. The fugitives were tracked a considerable distance, and have, it is said, been located. The community is greatly excited over the outrage, and if the perpetrators are found, the chances are that they will be treated to a dose of Western justice.

FOUND IN THE POOR-HOUSE.

A Broken-Hearted Man Leaves His Home and After Years is Discovered in Illinois.

A Shelbyville, Ill., despatch says: Twelve years ago there resided in Gallatin county, Kentucky, Martin H. Phillips, his wife, a son and a daughter. The family owned a section of land and was possessed of considerable money. The daughter was given every comfort wealth could afford, but she became wayward and broke her father's heart. Half crazed he took several thousand dollars and departed from home, declaring he would for the remainder of his life be a wanderer. His friends made every effort to find him, but were unsuccessful, and finally gave him up as dead.

A few days ago his son, still living on the farm with his mother, in looking over the list of pensions allowed saw the name of Martin H. Phillips as having been pensioned for services in the Mexican war, and that he resided at Shelbyville, Ill. The son immediately started and arrived here yesterday to find his long-lost father an inmate of the poor-house. The young man will soon take the wanderer, who is now 72 years of age, back to his once-forsaken home, where the family will again be re-united.

IN DEFENCE OF HIS MOTHER.

A Fifteen-Year-Old Maryland Boy Kills his Drunken Father.

A Baltimore despatch says: Peter Alt proprietor of the Arlington house, near the Pimlico race track, was shot and killed last night by his son William, aged fifteen years. The shooting took place in the kitchen of the residence and was the outcome of a family quarrel. Alt's wife says the shooting was done in her defence. Her husband had been on a spree, and just before the tragedy he came into the house, and after breaking a heavy cup and saucer on her head began to call her hard names and to beat her. She struggled with him and they fell on the floor. He got hold of her throat, and she thought he meant to kill her. She was almost insensible when she heard the report of a gun. Her husband's grip on her throat relaxed, and he fell over on the floor. Young Alt, who is a bright-looking little boy, was arrested and looked up after an affectionate parting with his mother.

A WOMAN'S CONFESSION.

She Murders Her Husband and Children to Get Their Life Insurance.

HER TERRIBLE STORY OF THE CRIME.

A Philadelphia telegram says: Mrs. Sarah J. Whiteling, 40 years old, was committed to prison by Coroner Ashbridge this afternoon, after she had confessed to deliberately murdering her husband and two children for less than $400, for which their lives were insured. The Whiteling family consisted, besides the wife, of John Whiteling, the husband, aged 38 years; Bertha, aged 9 years, and Willie, aged 2 years and nine months.

The husband died March 20th, and Dr. G. W. Smith, who attended him, gave a certificate of death due to inflammation of the bowels. On April 24th Bertha died, and Dr. Smith certified that her death was due to gastric fever. May 26th Willie died and Dr. Dietrich, who was called in after Dr. Smith had abandoned the case, said death was caused by congestion of the bowels.

SMALL PRICES FOR MURDER.

John Whiteling's life was insured for $145 in the John Hancock Company. He was also a member of Herd No. 2 Benevolent Order of Buffalos, which pays a death benefit of $85 to the widow. This money was collected by Mrs. Whiteling immediately after her husband's death. She insured Bertha in the Hancock Company for $122, and Willie was insured in the Prudential Insurance Company for $17, and in the Hancock Company for $30. The amount of money received on the death of husband and children was $399.

The fact of the three deaths at intervals of only one month was brought to the notice of Coroner Ashbridge, and after examining the records in the Health Office he was satisfied the case was one his office should investigate. He communicated with Chief of Detectives Wood, and Detective Gyer was detailed to assist the coroner. The bodies had all been buried in one grave in Mechanics' Cemetery.

CRIME DISCOVERED.

The Coroner ordered them to be exhumed on Wednesday. Professor Leffmann made an analysis of the parts given to him by the Coroner and on Sunday reported to Coroner Ashbridge that he found arsenic enough in the bodies to cause death. Mrs. Whiteling was taken in custody and locked up in the Central station. She was closely watched to prevent her from committing suicide. She spent most of the day in praying, and on Monday she suffered so from nervous prostration that a physician had to be called in. The Coroner charged her with killing her husband and children and told her to send for him when she was ready to make confession.

CONFESSION MADE.

To-day she made a full and clear confession to the Coroner and was committed to Moyamensing. The inquest was to be held to-day at 11 o'clock.

In her confession Mrs. Whiteling says: "My only reason for poisoning the children was that Bertha might grow up to be a sinful and wicked girl, as she had at various times stolen pennies and once a pocketbook from her teacher at school at Hancock and Thompson streets. Bertha acknowledged taking the pocketbook. She told many bad stories. She was very sinful for one so young, and I did not want her to grow up and become a great sinner. My little boy was sinless, and I poisoned him because he was in the way. I could not go out to work for there was no one to take care of him, and he was a burden to me. Without him I could get along. Now I know my children are angels in heaven and I want to meet them there when I die."

The Speed of Trains.

There is not one person in one hundred of the millions who travel on railroads in the course of a year has any idea of the speed of a train. A large per cent. of even the regular train men of the country cannot tell with any degree of accuracy how fast a train is running. Frequently engineers are despatched on a trip over a line of railroad, with instructions to run at a speed of a certain number of miles an hour. The engineers do not carry a speed indicator, but have learned by various methods to gauge their engines so as to make only the slightest variations from their orders. The majority of engineers use their driving-wheel as a gauge. They know its circumference, and by counting its revolutions within a certain time can tell very accurately the speed at which they are running. Another method is to time the run between the mile-posts, and still another is to make calculations from the number of telegraph poles passed in a certain time. These poles, in a level country, and where four or five wires are used, are spaced that there are thirty to the mile. If only a single wire is used they are spaced from twenty-five to twenty-eight to the mile. The most accurate method, and one most in use by experienced railroad men, is to count the number of rail-joints the train passes over in twenty seconds. The rails, in nearly all cases, are thirty feet in length, and the number passed over in twenty seconds is the speed per hour the train is running. For instance, if a passenger sitting in a sleeper can count thirty clicks of the wheels on a rail-joint in twenty seconds, the train is running at the speed of thirty miles an hour.—Kansas City Times.

An Immigrant Cruelly Swindled.

A Montreal telegram says: Another party of Poles, numbering 20 or 25, arrived in the city yesterday. A few of them had a little money, but these were unwilling to lend to those who had nothing, and hours were spent on the part of an interpreter trying to urge the party to remain together and to go to work railroading at Sudbury. A cruel circumstance was brought out. On the interpreter making inquiries as to what money they had, one of them produced a number of what looked like American three dollar bills. Upon examination, however, they turned out to be advertisements of a stationery firm in St. Paul. When the poor fellow was made to understand that the so-called bills had no value his distress was extreme. He stated that a friend had sent them to him from the States.

BEST FEED FOR MILKERS.

Mr. Vallancey E. Fuller on the Value of Ensilage.

SOME INTERESTING EXPERIMENTS.

One of the speakers at the successful picnic of the East York Farmers' Institute in Scarboro' Friday was Mr. V. E. Fuller, of this city. He announced he was a lawyer, dairyman and whatever else folks choose to call him—but an admitted enthusiast on the question of "Ensilage as a food in the production of milk." Referring to the address of Professor Robertson he said his (Mr. Fuller's) own progress had been much impeded from want of an education such as that furnished at the experimental farm, and he would therefore urge upon farmers the necessity of giving their sons the training he had so sadly missed. As President of the Central Institution he felt confident, from what he knew of the vast influence exerted by his fellow-agriculturist throughout the country, that if true to their best interests and less bigoted in politics they would speedily obtain whatever was necessary to the furtherance and development of the important industry they were there to represent. People talked of tightness in the money market and attributed it to bank failures, etc., but it would be found on examination that the real cause was a shortage of crops, amounting last year to something like sixteen millions of dollars. He (the speaker) had seven years ago stated that the dairy cow would some day become and he held the same opinion still. The cheese production of Ontario was an honor to the country, and the butter output "a curse and a disgrace." For every tub of good butter produced there were twenty bad—all owing to a lack of information how to properly manufacture it. Only when the farmer is educated in this respect will he discover that the cow is the best bank account he has. He can no longer rely upon grain growing, and the sooner he is made aware of the fact the better that the cow is the principal factor in his redemption. The speaker next described the proper sort of cow to select, viz., such as produced the best results in quantity and quality. There were many cows in this country that had to be kept the year round and yielded only 125 lbs. The better plan was to keep none that yielded less than well up to double the quantity, and when old "give her a decent burial." He would urge upon farmers the advantages of interdairying by means of creameries, and thus not only relieve their wives and daughters of the present drudgery, but retain much of what was vital to the well-being of the soil. The day was not far distant when, as in Boston and New York, milk would be sold in Toronto on its merits, and at prices proportionate to the solids it contained. He would also emphasize the importance of giving warmer water to milch cows. At Oaklands the temperature was raised in this respect to 70 degrees. Butter sold by the pound should be stamped with the maker's mark or name, as by so doing, if good, it would always command purchasers at a price over the unstamped article of 2 or 3 cents a pound.

THE QUEEN OF CANADA,

ANOTHER IMPORTANT FACTOR

was the "production of feed at the least possible cost." Five years ago the speaker constructed an ensilage pit 24 feet long, 16 wide and 18 deep, supplied with fodder raised from Southern corn, sown early in June, which proved quite a success; and a similar one constructed by a New York gentleman was opened after seven years and the contents discovered to be in a state of perfect preservation. The essential point was to render the silo air tight, otherwise as in the case of canned fruit when exposed, the contents would rapidly become so much putrid matter. The corn the speaker would recommend for ensilage was the "B & W," "Mammoth South," and "Red Cob" varieties—preference being given to the last named—some three inches between each kernel, and in rows 2½ feet apart, or sufficiently so to admit the cultivator, which is kept going until the height of the stocks prevent. The crop is cut when at the glazing point, allowed to wither, hauled in and cut into ¾-inch lengths, put into a silo, will tramped; sinks a good deal; filled up again—and still again if necessary—until done settling; covered with tar paper, and above this, six or eight inches of earth, and the thing is done. Such ensilage, the speaker remarked, averages 50 pounds to the cubic foot, will keep for an indefinite period, and is one of the most valuable foods for milk production that a farmer can possibly raise.

Mr. Fuller was voted hearty thanks for his able address.

Swallowed the Testament.

A Birmingham, Ala., despatch says John Hauk, a well-known religious farmer, recently sentenced to 45 years in the mines for murder, has gone crazy and is now chained to his cell in the County jail. This morning he commenced to pull his clothes off, a little piece at a time. When perfectly nude, hair by hair, he pulled them all off the right side of his head. He then commenced to pull little pieces of flesh from his legs, and when he attempted to butt his brains out he was chained. He called for a bible and swallowed half of the new testament, leaf by leaf. He is rich, and has a large family.

Taking Freckles From Pretty Faces

In season just now is the old court recipe for bathing the face with the juice of crushed strawberries, letting it dry on over night, and washing off in the morning with chervil water, which must be replaced by rose water or well-boiled soft water. If kept up for a week this should take the freckles off by its pure acid, which we all know whitens the teeth. Barberry pulp removes tan and freckles; hence I will recommend girls to try it just before going back to the city after a summer in the country. And I am forgetting the pleasantest method of clearing the complexion by a course of new maple syrup, eaten hot every morning. Brown bread and West India molasses are not so pleasant, but work a very miracle in producing an alabaster skin and lumin ous eyes. West India molasses has old repute for its cleansing and detergent properties on silks and woolens, due to its alcohol and acids. But it is also a cosmetic, used by Jamaica women, rubbed on the cheeks and allowed to stay on as long as one can endure it, an hour perhaps. To rub the body all over with it, and sit in a warm bath room half an hour or less, and wash off in hot water, followed by a perfumed bath is said to have a marvellous effect in preserving the youth and freshness of the whole system. Let those who like it try it.

Franklin's Advice to Mothers.

In a parcel of Benjamin Franklin's letters that have recently been made public is one addressed to a lady congratulating her upon the well-being of her baby boy, whom she had announced as having cut five teeth. He writes: "Pray let him have everything he likes. I think it of great consequence while the features of the countenance are forming; it gives them a pleasant air, and one that becomes fixed and natural by habit, the face is ever handsomer afterward for it, and on that much of a person's good fortune and success in life may depend." Franklin did not mean by this that the child should be given all the food it wanted, but that it should be surrounded by pleasant objects for its amusement and diversion. "Who has not seen a scowl of discontent upon the face of an infant deepen and become a permanent defect—a lifelong proof of the discomforts of its babyhood?" Verily the sins of parents are visited upon their helpless children. After a few more telling arguments in favor of the child, the writer says: "Always believe a child—at least, do not express your unbelief if you can help it. If the little fellow sees that you rely upon his word she feels an increased respect for the truth and for himself, until at length his character for probity will become matured and established." Many an exceptionally imaginative child is unable to distinguish between facts and fancies, as fairy tales and Mother Goose melodies quite bewilder his brain with their semblance of reality. Such children are apt to conjure up curious stories in which truth and fiction are hopelessly confused, and will relate them in all seriousness.

The Use of Perfumes.

In the days of our grandfathers, lavender was scattered through the linen press, and chests of clothes had little bags of sweet herbs, sweet clover scented the handkerchiefs, and there was a dainty odor clinging to everything pertaining to the lady's wardrobe. To-day perfumes are used in even more forms and in all imaginable places. There are satchel bags to pin into the dress, satchel cases to hold handkerchiefs, others to hold note paper, and others filled with violet powder and orris root to use on the skin. A cluster of tiny perfumed bags hangs over the back of one's lounging chair, and odd little devices scatter a delightful odor about the table of bric-a-brac. A pillow filled with pine needles sheds an aromatic perfume over the divan cushions, a rose jar filled with a pot-pourri of rose leaves, salt and spices, graces the dining-room table, and a sponge sprayed with rare perfume stands on a dainty porcelain tray ready to moisten one's finger tips. These are the ordinary ornaments now of dining-rooms or parlors of all households where enough of an income prevails to allow of any luxurious decorations.

High Heels and Pointed Toes.

Since the high heel and pointed toe have had time to do their work the chiropodist is rising to a smoney-making a position as the American dentist. The women who operate in the public baths for ladies have more work than they can attend to, and are raising their fees according to the state of the pairs of feet which they are asked to attend to. The ordinary old-fashioned treatment, requiring only the sharp knife and the pumice stone, is still a frank and a half. But for the operation known as "dehoofing" the foot, you may, with extras, get up from 10f. to 30f. There are women who are able when the fine world is in Paris to make from £3 to £5 a day. The seaside season is even more lucrative, because feet are so much in view on the sands of marine bathing places, where it is permissible to paddle about in salt water long after the teens have been cleared. Be it remembered that the high-heeled boot or shoe, by throwing the whole weight of the body on the tightened-up toes, deadens them and the rest of the foot, and brings the whole member, so far as the distribution of muscular force and nervous vitality go, into much the same state as a horse's hoof. The dehoofing process begins with a warm bran or potato-starch foot bath, followed by a quick plunge in cold water, after which there is shampooing with eau de Cologne or something else to help a reaction. Then there is a gymnastic pulling out and moving up and down and from side to side of individual toes, which reminds one of the piggy-wiggy game which nurses play with the pedal extremities of babies. The nurse, beginning with the great toe and going on with the four others says: "This pig went to the market, and this pig stayed at home, and this pig ate bread and butter, and this pig ate none, and this little pig cried, take me to mammy at home." The toes are manipulated and exercised separately, until each is limber and lively. The sole of the foot is also enlivened thus: The patient leans with both hands on a pair of props, and places the foot on a broad horse-hair band which works from side to side; then comes more hand rubbing, this time with glycerine, followed by friction with small brushes and instruments like drawing stumps. The nails are carefully attended to. All dead and hard skin is carefully removed, and finally the ankle and instep are put into gymnastic training. At the end of, say, an hour, a pair of feet which have been martyrized with high heels and pointed toes feel equal to dancing, jumping or taking a long walk. They also look shapely and quite young. One wonders why they should be hidden with shoes and stockings, and whether skilled chiropody will not look to a revival of sandals.—Paris Letter in London Truth.

Like the Paper on the Wall.

It has come at last; it has been on the way ever since the very tight sleeves and snug-fitting bodices engrossed the feminine fancy. A patent has been taken out by an enterprising clothier for a garment that fits the figure literally like the paper on the wall. The measurements are taken with accuracy, and the novelty is in the shape of the seams, which are so made as to dispense with all vestige of a wrinkle. These eel-skin bodices are worn with riding-habits, and so as to get every curve and motion the lady is fitted while seated upon an imitation horse, assuming precisely the position she would on a real steed.—Table Talk.

Seasonable Recipes.

Strawberry Cream Cake.—Make a very light sponge cake from six eggs, and bake it in three jelly cake tins. While it is baking and cooling, cover a quarter box of gelatine with a half cup of cold water and soak a half hour. Whip one pint of cream, and put in a tin or granite pan; stand this pan in another containing cracked ice. Add to the cream a half cup of powdered sugar and a teasponful of vanilla sugar. Stir the gelatine over boiling water until it dissolves, add it to the cream and stir at once, and continue stirring until the cream begins to thicken. When the cakes are cold put over one a thick layer of this cream; then stand strawberries evenly all over it; put on another layer of the cake; cover it with cream and berries, and so continue, having the top layer cream and berries. Serve very cold.

For a delicate temperance nectar taken with the dessert: Chop two pounds of fine Sultana raisins, add the grated yellow rind and juice of four large lemons and two pounds of powdered sugar candy. Melt this in a gallon of water in a large porcelain kettle. Boil and skim it for half an hour, and while it is boiling add by degrees the lemon and raisins. Continue boiling for ten minutes, then put the mixture in a stone jar and cover it closely. Let it stand for three days, stirring it down to the bottom each day. Strain it through a linen bag and bottle it, sealing the corks. It will be ready for use in two weeks. The quantity of this and other preparations can be doubled and trebled as required.

Language of the Eyes.

Black (dark brown) are a sign of passionate ardor in love.

Dark blue or violet denote great affection or purity, but not much intellectuality.

Clear, light blue, with calm, steadfast glance, denote cheerfulness, good temper, constancy.

Pale blue or steel colored, with shifting motion of eyelids and pupils, denote deceitfulness and selfishness.

Russet brown, without yellow, denote an affectionate disposition, sweet and gentle. The darker the brown the more ardent the passion.

Blue, with greenish tints, are not so strongly indicative of these traits, but a slight propensity to greenish tints in eyes of any color is a sign of wisdom and courage.

Gray, or greenish gray, with orange and blue shades and ever varying tints, are the most intellectual and are indicative of the impulsive, impressionable temperament—the mixture of sanguine and bilious, which produces poetic and artistic natures.

Light brown, or yellow, denote inconsistency; green, deceit and coquetry. Eyes of no particular color (only some feeble shades of blue or gray, dull, expressionless, dead looking) belong to the lymphatic temperament, and denote a listless, feeble disposition, and a cold, selfish nature.

They Bounced the Tenor Singer.

The action just taken by the churchwardens of Holy Trinity Church, Hounslow, England, will meet with the approval of a very great many church-goers. The congregation of Holy Trinity includes a Mr. Todd. It appears from reliable evidence that when Mr. Todd sings everybody else in the church laughs, although he sings so loud that the irreverent giggling is not heard. The churchwardens having stood it for 13 years, decided that the time had come to interfere, particularly as Mr. Todd's tenor voice kept getting louder and more objectionable all the time. Mr. Todd has been solemnly informed that he must either stop singing or leave the church, and he has resigned rather than cease his music. The proceedings of Todd before the churchwardens appeared rather comical. He flew into a rage, vowed he had a good tenor voice, and offered to fight a man who suggested that it was more like the roaring of a bull. Todd swore he never would stop singing, told his critics that they were flying in the face of Providence and the Book of King David. The Chairman said he didn't want to hear anything about King David, who probably had a better voice than Todd, and refused the request of the latter that a seat should be given him in the choir. Todd said it was all jealousy, and wound up his defence by offering to sing in turn all the churchwardens present for a guinea apiece, any competent judge to be chosen. The offer was not accepted.

To Remove Iron Rust.

The Revue Industrielle suggests to remove iron rust, mix one part of prussiate of potash, one part of fat soap and two parts of chalk, with sufficient water to form a thick paste. Rub the article with this mixture after saturating with a solution of prussiate of potash in twice its weight of water. This will work on metals, but would probably stain clothes, etc., with a blue stain.

ARE YOU SICK?

Do you feel dull, languid, low-spirited, lifeless, and indescribably miserable, both physically and mentally; experience a sense of fullness or bloating after eating, or of "goneness," or emptiness of stomach in the morning, tongue coated, bitter or bad taste in mouth, irregular appetite, dizziness, frequent headaches, blurred eyesight, "floating specks" before the eyes, nervous prostration or exhaustion, irritability of temper, hot flushes, alternating with chilly sensations, sharp, biting, transient pains here and there, cold feet, drowsiness after meals, wakefulness, or disturbed and unrefreshing sleep, constant, indescribable feeling of dread, or of impending calamity?

If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common of American maladies—Bilious Dyspepsia, or Torpid Liver, associated with Dyspepsia, or Indigestion. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, DR. PIERCE'S GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY will subdue it, if taken according to directions for a reasonable length of time, if not cured, complications multiply and Consumption of the Lungs, Skin Diseases, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Kidney Disease, or other grave maladies are quite liable to set in, and, sooner or later, induce a fatal termination.

DR. PIERCE'S GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY acts powerfully upon the Liver, and through that great blood-purifying organ, cleanses the system of all blood-taints and impurities, from whatever cause arising. It is equally efficacious in acting upon the Kidneys, and other excretory organs, cleansing, strengthening, and healing their diseases. As an appetizing, restorative tonic, it promotes digestion and nutrition, thereby building up both flesh and strength. In malarial districts, this wonderful medicine has gained great celebrity in curing Fever and Ague, Chills and Fever, Dumb Ague, and kindred diseases.

BILIOUS ATTACK.

DAVID G. LOWE, Esq., of St. Agathe, Manitoba, Canada, says: "Being troubled with a terrible bilious attack, fluttering of the heart, poor rest at night, etc., I commenced the use of your 'Golden Medical Discovery' and 'Pellets,' and derived the very highest benefit therefrom."

LIVER DISEASE.

Mrs. I. V. WEBBER, of Yorkshire, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., writes: "For five years previous to taking 'Golden Medical Discovery' and 'Pellets,' I was a great sufferer; had a severe pain in my right side continually; was unable to do my own work. I am now well and strong."

"FOR THE BLOOD IS THE LIFE."

Thoroughly cleanse the blood, which is the fountain of health, by using DR. PIERCE'S GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY, and good digestion, a fair skin, buoyant spirits, and bodily health and vigor will be established.

GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY cures all humors, from a common Blotch, or Eruption, to the worst Scrofula. Salt-rheum, "Fever-sores," Scaly or Rough Skin, in short, all diseases caused by bad blood, are conquered by this powerful, purifying, and invigorating medicine. Great Eating Ulcers rapidly heal under its benign influence. Virulent blood-poisons are, by its use, robbed of their terrors. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, Hip-joint Disease, "White Swellings," Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands.

A medicine possessing the power to cure such inveterate blood and skin diseases as the following testimonial portrays, must certainly be credited with possessing properties capable of curing any and all skin and blood diseases, for none are more obstinate or difficult of cure than Salt-rheum.

SALT-RHEUM AND RHEUMATISM.

"COLUMBUS, OHIO, Aug. 18th, 1887.
WORLD'S DISPENSARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, 663 Main Street, Buffalo, N. Y.:
Gentlemen—For several years I have felt it to be my duty to give to you the facts in relation to the complete cure of a most aggravated case of salt-rheum, by the use of your 'Golden Medical Discovery.' An elderly lady relative of mine had been a great sufferer from salt-rheum for upwards of forty years. The disease was most distressing in her hands, causing the skin to crack open on the inside of the fingers at the joints and between the fingers. She was obliged to protect the raw places by means of adhesive plasters, salves, ointments and bandages, and during the winter months had to have her hands dressed daily. The pain was quite severe at times and her general health was badly affected, paving the way for other diseases to creep in. Catarrh and rheumatism caused a great deal of suffering in addition to the salt-rheum. She had used faithfully, and with the most commendable perseverance, all the remedies prescribed by her physicians, but without obtaining relief. She afterwards began treating herself by drinking teas made from blood-purifying roots and herbs. She continued this for several years but derived no benefit. Finally, about ten years ago, I chanced to read one of Dr. Pierce's small pamphlets setting forth the merits of his 'Golden Medical Discovery' and other medicines. The name struck my fancy, and seeing that it was essentially a blood-purifier, I immediately recommended it to the old lady who had been so long a sufferer from salt-rheum. She commenced taking it at once, and took one bottle, but seemed to be no better. However, I realized that it would take time for any medicine to effect a change for the better, and encouraged her to continue. She then purchased a half-a-dozen bottles, and before these had all been used she began to notice an improvement. After taking about a dozen bottles she was entirely cured. Her hands were perfectly well and as smooth and healthy as a child's. Her general health was also greatly improved; the rheumatism entirely left her, and the catarrh was almost cured, so that it ceased to be much annoyance. She has enjoyed excellent health from that day to this, and has had no return of either salt-rheum or rheumatism. The 'Discovery' seems to have entirely eradicated the salt-rheum from her system. She is now over eighty years old, and very healthy for one of such extreme age.

I have written this letter, of which you can make any use you see fit, hoping that some sufferer from salt-rheum might chance to read it and obtain relief by using your 'Golden Medical Discovery'—for 'Golden' it is in its curative properties, and as much above the multitude of nostrums and so-called 'patent medicines,' as zealously thaunted before the public, as gold is above the baser metals. Respectfully yours,
F. W. WHEELER, 182 21st St."

CONSUMPTION, WEAK LUNGS, SPITTING OF BLOOD.

GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY cures Consumption (which is Scrofula of the Lungs), by its wonderful blood-purifying, invigorating and nutritive properties. For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Shortness of Breath, Bronchitis, Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Severe Coughs, Asthma, and kindred affections, it is a sovereign remedy. While it promptly cures the severest Coughs, it strengthens the system and purifies the blood.

CONSUMPTION.

SOLOMON BUTTS, of North Clayton, Miami Co., Ohio, writes: "I have not the words to express my gratitude for the good your 'Golden Medical Discovery' has done my wife. She was taken with consumption, and after trying one doctor after another I finally gave up all hope of relief. Being very poor and having but one dollar in the world, I prayed to God that he might show me something; and then it seems as though something did tell me to get your 'Golden Medical Discovery.' My wife took it as directed, and as a result she is so she can work now."

COUGH OF FIVE YEARS' STANDING.

Mrs. N. W. RICE, of Newfane, Vermont, says: "I feel at liberty to acknowledge the benefit I received from two bottles of the 'Golden Medical Discovery,' which cured a cough of five years' standing, and dyspepsia, from which I had suffered for a long time. I have also used Dr. Pierce's Extract of Smart-Weed, or Water Pepper, in my family, with good effect."

GAINED 25 POUNDS.

Wasting Disease.—WATSON F. CLARKE, Esq., of (Box 104), Summerside, Prince Edward Island, Can., writes: "When I commenced taking your 'Golden Medical Discovery,' I was not able to work and was a burden to myself. At that time I weighed 122 pounds, and to-day I weigh 147 pounds. Then I used to eat about one meal a day, and now can eat four or five if I dared to."

WORTH $1000 A BOTTLE.

W. R. DAVIS, Esq., of Bellville, Florida, writes: "I have taken your wonderful 'Golden Medical Discovery' and have been cured of consumption. I am now sound and well, and have only spent three dollars, and I would not take three thousand dollars and be put back where I was."

Street Scenes in Venice.

Among the crowds which gather on St. Mark's piazza in the lovely spring afternoons are women quite as beautiful as those which smile on you from the canvas of the old painters. They are fond of strange tints, odd shades of red, green and blue; they wear, some of them, old-fashioned three-cornered shawls of fine patterns and bold colors, presenting a very picturesque appearance. Many of the children are remarkably pretty. They look out with large eyes from under their tangled, curly locks, like so many cherubs fitted with half naked bodies. They are very thievish, too, and one has to be very watchful of them. That most of them are beggars will be no news to your readers. If you go in the evening to eat an ice, or take a cup of coffee at Florain's, in St. Mark's square, these soft-voiced, ragged little thieves come creeping up to you with their bright faces, pointing to their red-ripe mouths to tell you they are hungry, offering matches for sale, or asking you for the end of your cigar, your coffee, your cake. But they must be watched all the time, for they will steal whatever they lay their hands on.—Providence Journal.

A Logical Guess.

Miss Youngbelle (at a reception, pointing to a girlishly dressed but rather antique party on the opposite side of the room—How old is Miss Neverdy?

Mr. Jokerby—54.

Miss Youngbelle—Oh, nonsense! she's not as old as that.

Mr. Jokerby—Well, I don't know, but she's celebrated her eighteenth birthday three times to my knowledge, and three times eighteen is fifty-four.

$500 Reward.

The former proprietor of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy for years made a standing, public offer in all American newspapers of $500 reward for a case of catarrh that he could not cure. The present proprietors have renewed this offer. All the druggists sell this Remedy, together with the "Douche," and all other appliances advised to be used with it. No catarrh patient is longer able to say "I cannot be cured. You get $500.

What precipices are idleness and pleasure! Do you know that to do nothing is a melancholy resolution; to live in idleness on the property of society; to be useless, that is to say, pernicious? This leads straight to the depths of wretchedness. Woe to the man who desires to be a parasite! He will become vermin.

Rev. Dr. Leonard, lately of Brooklyn and now rector of St. John's Church, Washington, D. C., is the youngest bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, being just 4 years old.

The Thermometric Scale.

The scale in use in any thermometer is more or less arbitrary. It is necessary to fix two definite temperatures, and assign their positions on a scale. Water, being one of the most common bodies in nature, is usually employed, and freezing and boiling points are taken as definite points, especially as the temperature of freezing water or of melting ice is almost absolutely fixed—pressure altering it only very slightly. The thermometer generally used in the United States and Great Britain is of the Fahrenheit scale, which places the freezing point too great by 23 degrees. In Germany the scale used is Raumer's, which places the freezing point at zero, as does also the French measurement, which is known as the centigrade scale, and is used almost exclusively by scientific men of all nations. It is supposed that Fahrenheit fixed his zero at the point of greatest cold that he had observed.

I wonder Grimes has any friends—
His manner grows so surly;
No matter where we chance to meet,
Or whether late or early,
'Tis just the same: he cannot stay,
And barely answers a "Good-day."

Now this is a sad case of misconception. It is not Grimes' disposition which is at fault, but his liver. He can't appear jolly when he feels miserable. If he would take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, the great liver, stomach and bowel regulator, he would soon be the same happy fellow as of old—agreeable to himself and the world generally.

Weather Probabilities.

Street-car Passenger—Do you know what the weather probabilities are this morning, sir? Citizen—No, I haven't seen the paper yet. But I fancy fair weather is predicted; I notice everybody has an umbrella.

What's the Use?

Why suffer a single moment, when you can get immediate relief from internal or external pain by the use of Polson's NERVILINE, the great pain cure? Nerviline has never been known to fail. Try a 10 cent sample bottle. You will find it just as recommended, Neuralgia, toothache, cramps, headache, and all similar complaints disappear as if by magic when Nerviline is used. Large bottles 55 cents. Test bottles 10 cents, at druggists' and country dealers'.

A butcher of Gallipolis, O., dreamed that his horse was running away and that he jumped from the waggon. The dream was so realistic that he jumped out of a third-story window, and when picked up was badly bruised.

The Prince is not Beau Brummel.

We must be getting very fastidious with our clothes when we cannot take a pattern even from the Prince of Wales. At a late Newmarket meeting last year the Prince wore a suit of "dittoes" of a large check, whereof two suits might have been to the pattern. The tailors were overjoyed at such patronage for their specialty, and at once commenced to push the cloth. A younger generation of Brummels has, however, a mind of its own, and has decided that the new thing is not worth giving its mind to. Hence the men with the needles are in open lamentation, and will learn the lesson that if the cloth can make a man the man cannot always make a cloth. While on this subject I may note that the Prince is very fond of lounge suits, and perhaps sports the most extraordinary varieties of any man in London. Even in the season, if there is any chance of getting away from the immediate vicinity of Pall Mall, he leaves the staid black coat and flies to the well-beloved checks.—Vanity Fair.

$40,000 Lost.

"I lost forty thousand dollars by a periodical attack of nervous sick headache," said a Chicago capitalist to a correspondent, pointing across the street to a handsome corner lot. "That lot was sold for ten thousand dollars at public auction five years ago, and I intended to buy it, but was too sick with headache to attend the sale, and it is now worth fifty thousand dollars." If he had known of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets they would have removed the cause of his headaches—biliousness—and he would have made the money. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets cure sick headache, bilious headache dizziness, constipation, indigestion, and bilious attacks; 25 cents a vial, by druggists.

THE MONTREAL CONVENTION.

The great Temperance Convention to be held in Montreal next week, is being looked forward to with considerable interest by all classes. Teetotallers are hopeful that wisdom and harmony will characterize the deliberations of the conventioners, whatever the outcome may be. Many of these consider the country ripe for prohibition and are in hopes that there will be a unanimity of sentiment in this particular at the Convention. The licensed victuallers, although seriously alarmed at the tremendous growth of Temperance principles, are confident that the recent sweeping anti Scott Act victories will have such a dampening effect that no definite action will be taken.

THE ADVANCE believes in educating the people in this matter; and, much as it dislikes anything approaching fanaticism and gush and froth sentiment, it cannot but recognize that those are, after all, educating forces—the natural sequences attendant upon the uprooting of great social evils. It also believes that the prejudice of centuries cannot be overcome and great moral reforms effected at a bound, so to speak. The agitation against slavery has been going on for a century, and the end is not yet—although, in process of time, every root of that great evil will have been torn up from the face of the earth. The first Temperance society was organized half a century ago, and although the growth of the movement since then has been the theme and wonder of the civilized world, it is yet practically in its infancy. It will take years of patient, persistent, solid work, before signal triumphs can be achieved. What matters a few reverses? No great end has ever been attained without defeats as well as victories. At the same time, let Temperance people be warned by these "beacon lights" and avoid the danger of taking ground too far in advance of public sentiment.

BILLETING AT CONFERENCE.

The Secretary of the Billeting Committee of the Methodist church, writes the Editor of THE ADVANCE anent a clipping from this journal, which appeared in a recent issue of the Toronto Daily Globe. The following is the clipping:

"Sometimes a representive come in contact with people after his own heart, but more frequently there is diversity of tastes, opinions and everything else, which has the tendency to send the delegate out on the streets, in order to seek for more congenial companions. Several delegates refused to be billeted at private houses and went to the hotels—preferring to forfeit the $2 deposit rather than run the risk of uncongenial companionship and diversity of tastes."

We are sorry that there should have been any feeling in this matter. The quotation above does not cover all the ground. The article anent billeting was general in its tone, and there was no intention whatever in the mind of the Editor to reflect upon the generous and hearty hospitality of the good people of Seaforth. In short the sentences quoted in the Globe were taken here and there at random from the article in THE ADVANCE. But it is not the people's hospitality or generosity that is in question at all. The host or hostess might be ever so hospitable, and still the "uncongeniality of companionship and diversity of tastes" might or might not be there all the same.

The delegates who refused to be billeted at private houses, did so purely and simply because they preferred stopping at a public house. At least so they told the Editor of THE ADVANCE, who penned the objectionable paragraph himself and not "your correspondent."

To prevent any chance for mis-construing, let us say that the Editor's billet was quite satisfactory. That is all we have to say about the matter at present.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

There were four cases tried before the Judge at the last session of Markdale Division Court, and two of them were adjourned.

If a stone and brick bridge can be built over the Boyne at anything like a reasonable price, it would not pay to put up a wooden structure.

When gravel is used for the purpose of improving the public highways, it is not a bad idea to spread it evenly. There are hills and hollows enough as it is.

A meeting should be called at an early date to take into consideration the straightening of the road to the Station. This important project should not be lost sight of for a moment. The sooner it is taken hold of in a practical manner the better.

Dominion Day is to be celebrated in Dundalk in big shape. The Committee of Management announce that prizes to the value of "$500" will be given to competitors in the various games and sports. Consulting the prize list, our Sporting Editor could only find "$299 in Prizes" instead of "$500 in Prizes" as announced in a display line on the same bill. Do they possess the secret of converting $299 into $500 by some feat of legerdemain know only to themselves, or have they entered the lists as champion "fish yarn" spouters.

Early last Saturday morning (about 2:30) Messrs. Graydon and son, of Streetsville, discovered two suspicious looking characters lurking around their premises. They gave chase, when one of the supposed burglars suddenly wheeled and fired three shots, each of which lodged in the body of the elder Mr. Graydon. The son continued the chase and grappling with one of the rascals, wrested the revolver from him, and would have succeeded in effecting his capture had not the accomplice returned and assisted his comrade, when both made good their escape. The rural districts are swarming with suspicious characters and people will do well to be prepared for any emergency. Keep your guns loaded and bull dog's teeth filed if need be, but be always on the alert.

A FORM OF ASSASSINATION.

The encouragement of drunkenness, said Thomas Carlyle, for the sake of gaining money is more desperate form of assassination than has been adopted by the bravos of any country or age.

MARRIAGE.—Marrying men to reform them has never been a successful enterprise on the part of woman. Girls are worth too much unmarried to sacrifice their lives to beat sense into the head of any man on God's footstool. Such a man does not wean so easily as a calf. He will go home only to sober up, and then not till the other places are closed. A girl will marry such a man, hoping that next year he will be better; but the next year he will br worse. There are sober boys enough for all the girls; and there is no need for marrying a drunkard, and the girl who does so will deserve all the unhappiness she marries.—New York Sun.

The Montreal Convention.

The Dominion Prohibition Convention, to be held at Montreal on July 3rd, 4th and 5th, will be a gathering of remarkable interest. It will be the first national Canadian conference of delegated Prohibitionists. The great meeting at Montreal in 1875, out of which came the Dominion Alliance and the Scott Act, was simply a mass convention of active Temperance workers. In the coming meeting every delegate will represent a constituency of Prohibitionists anxiously waiting the decision of their leaders and the call to arms for further conflict.

The convention has been called by the Dominion Alliance, but it will be thoroughly independent when it meets, and will organize and control itself. Every Local Temperance organization, every Lodge, Division, Council, Union, Club, Church, Society, or any such institution is invited to send a delegate for each fifty of its membership, any number not being a complete fifty to count as fifty for the purpose of representation. Every Provincial Temperance organization is invited to send its Executive Committee or an equal number of representatives. Every Provincial Branch of the Alliance is to send ten, and every County Alliance or Scott Act Association is entitled to five.

The principal Railway and Steamboat lines are acting very liberally towards the Convention. The Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railways and Richelieu Steamboat Company will issue return tickets to Montreal, for a single fare, to all persons applying. Tickets will be issued on this plan from Saturday, June 30th, up to Tuesday, July 3rd, and will be good for return passage up to Saturday, July 7th. The intercolonial Railway will sell single fare tickets to Montreal at usual rates and will issue at Montreal return tickets FREE, on presentation of a certificate signed by the Secretary of the Convention. It will be seen that all who attend the Convention (which will be open to the public), whether delegates or not, may avail themselves of these reduced fares.

The meetings of the Convention proper will be held in the Victoria Rifles Armory on Cathcart Street. On Sunday evening, July 1st, there will be held a great Gospel Temperance meeting at some central point; on Monday, 2nd, there will be an excursion to Mystic, and a Prohibition picnic there; on Tuesday evening, 3rd, a monster Prohibition mass meeting will be held. All these gatherings will be addressed by the foremost moral reform workers of Canada.

Priceville Pointers.

Mr. Murdock McDonald, of Toronto—formerly of Priceville—is visiting friends here.

Mr. Thos. Atkinson, landlord of the Commercial Hotel, had a narrow escape from death last Friday. He was driving one of his spirited horses in front of the hotel, when the animal suddenly bolted and made for the stable. The vehicle was brought violently in contact with the side of the stable door and Mr. Atkinson was hurled with great force against one of the stalls. Although somewhat seriously injured, he is now able to move around.

Mr. Robt. Watson will take a few weeks' holidays shortly.

About a hundred maple trees were planted along the streets this spring. They are all thriving nicely and will add greatly to the appearance of the place.

The Trustees of this School Section are to be congratulated for their enterprise. Shade trees are to be planted on the school ground and other improvements will be made in due time. In order that the vulgar gaze may be most effectually eclipsed, a fine high board fence has been erected around the premises.

Deputy-Reeve McArthur returned home from County Council last week.

Mrs. Dr. James, of Orangeville has been visiting friends here. She returned home last week.

Mr. M. Reiley does a rushing business in blacksmithing and carriage making. No matter how dull the times are, Reiley is always busy.

It is reported that three young men from Flesherton visited this place one Sunday recently and got badly left.

The Agricultural Editor enjoyed a pleasant row in Dr. Hixon & Co's boat on Monday.

Work has commenced on the new Presbyterian church, but the progress made thus far has been rather slow. It will be a fine structure when completed.

Rev. Mr. Ottewell, the esteemed pastor of the Methodist church, is stationed here for another year.

Presentation and Address.

On Monday evening previous to the departure of Rev. J. S. Corcoran and family for their new field of labor, a few friends met at the parsonage and presented them with the following address and Mrs. Corcoran with a purse of money as a small token of the regard with which they were held by them. Mr. Corcoran made a very appropriate reply after which "The Sweet By and By" was sung and the assembly dispersed:—

To Mr. and Mrs. Corcoran.

DEAR FRIENDS,—As the time has now come when we must sever our connection as pastor and people, we, the friends of Salem and Eugenia appointments have met here this evening to say "good bye" and wish you God speed. You may feel assured that you will be followed to your new home by our prayers and sympathies and that we will cherish the remembrance of your faithful labors on this circuit. We take this opportunity to present Mrs. Corcoran with a purse of money collected by the ladies and may we all meet in that better Home "where congregations ne'er break up and Sabbaths have no end."

Maxwell.

From our own Correspondent.

Although times have been very dull here for some time past the spell was broken last week.

On Tuesday, Mr. Mark Murphy raised a large implement building and on Wednesday, Mr. Jackson Reed raised a large addition to his barn when the usual strife took place, but the greatest event of the season was the wedding of Mr. Thomas A. Heron, of Buffalo, to Miss Maggie Burk. There were about one hundred guests invited and the presents to the bride were numerous and costly. The happy pair leave this week for their home in Buffalo and carry with them the best wishes of the entire community.

A Sunday school picnic was held on the prairie on Mrs. St. Johns farm on Thursday last which was quite a success.

Rev. W. Ferrier, returned from Conference last week and will preach his farewell sermon on Sunday next when he will remove to his new field of labor at Queensville.

Farmers are complaining of the dry weather and hay is likely to be a short crop. In consequence all other crops are looking well but are in need of rain.

Eugenia.

From our own Correspondent.

For some time past it has been the custom of some sacriligious persons to amuse themselves about once a week by throwing stones through the windows in the Methodist church. Nothing has been said about it in public up to the present but a strict look out has been kept and the parties are now known. If their nefarious conduct is repeated they will probably feel the weight of the strong arm of the law. Such conduct deserves the censure of all and the perpetrators of such dastardly acts to be stigmatized as infamous by a whole community.

Mrs. Geo. Saul, of Toronto, is spending a few days with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Sloan.

On Saturday quite a number of Feversham aristocrats held a picnic on the ever popular picnic grounds at Eugenia. They seemed to enjoy themselves heartily and as though loath to leave the romantic place prolonged their stay far into the night. Come again!

Miss E. Hogg, of Flesherton Station, is visiting at her brother's, Mr. J. R. Hogg, of this place.

Miss Lilly Taylor, of Mount Zion, is the guest of Rev. J. S. Corcoran and family.

Mr. J. Hoppe has begun the business of wagon repairing, &c. in our thriving town. All we need now to have things handy is a railroad, a boot-black and a barber.

Mr. Alex. Madill has arrived home from Southern Manitoba where he has been for about three months. He reports a very cold spring and altogether does not give a very glowing account of that place. Crops were frozen close to the ground a few nights before he left—about the 1st of June.

Mr. D. McMullen has returned home from Northern Michigan, looking hale and hearty. LOU.

A young man named Brown got severely hurt while playing foot-ball at Swinton Park last Saturday evening. It appears he was running away with the ball at a lively rate and was about to get it through the goal when his opponent, a big fellow, ran against him knocking him down and hurting his leg and other parts of his body. He was unable to walk home and was carried to the nearest house where he remained until morning when his father came and drove him home.

Mr. Tine Moore got married to Rebecka Ginn, of Priceville. The ceremony took place away down in the lower settlement some place. You should not be so shy about it, Tine, you might know you would be found out, but nevertheless we wish you much joy.

Mr. Peter Ferguson has returned from Toronto Gore where he was working since spring on account of ill health. We are glad to hear he is getting better.

Mr. Charles Tuck, of Priceville, is working with Mr. J. T. Wilson. He seems to think the days are longer in Proton than they are in Priceville.

South Grey Teachers' Association.

The twenty-first semi-annual meeting of the Teachers of the inspectorate of South Grey took place in Durham on Thursday and Friday, June 7th and 8th. About seventy teachers were present and, from the very practical character of the program all must have been benefited. The wise words of advice given by Rev. Mr. McNair and Mr. Merchant could not fail to inspire every teacher to a higher appreciation of the work in which he is engaged. Mr. McNair considers the work of the teachers second to none and his responsibility equal to that of the minister of the Gospel.

Among the teachers were to be found many who seemed filled with enthusiasm and determination to pursue their labors with untiring energy.

Mr. Campbell, the Inspector, is fully alive to a sense of his duty and did much to make the convention the success it proved to be.

Mr. C. McArthur introduced a discussion on the New Arithmetic, followed by Mr. Irwin who was appointed critic.

Mr. Booth introduced "Music" and was ably criticised by Mr. Sproule, an advocate of the "Holt System" and a graduate of that school.

Mr. Edwards taught a little class in History in a very interesting manner.

Mr. McCool, of Hanover, gave an account of a case of corporal punishment in his school for which he considered the decision of the magistrate unjust and contrary to law. An appeal has been made and comes up for hearing in Owen Sound. Mr. McCool read the evidence of the plaintiff and the teachers seeing nothing deserving so severe a sentence passed a resolution giving as their opinion that corporal punishment is necessary in some cases.

Mr. Irwin was appointed delegate to the Provincial Teachers' Association in Toronto, in August, and as an appreciation for his services as Secretary an additional ten dollars per annum was vote to his salary.

The thanks of the Association are due to the musical talent of Durham for the excellent vocal and instrument music rendered at the evening meeting.

The next meeting will be held in Flesherton on the 25th and 26th of October.—COM.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

To Assist Nature

In restoring diseased or wasted tissue is all that any medicine can do. In pulmonary affections, such as Colds, Bronchitis, and Consumption, the mucous membrane first becomes inflamed, then accumulations form in the air-cells of the lungs, followed by tubercles, and, finally, destruction of the tissue. It is plain, therefore, that, until the hacking cough is relieved, the bronchial tubes can have no opportunity to heal. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral the inflamed membrane, arrests the wasting process, and leaves no injurious results. This is why it is more highly esteemed than any other pulmonary specific.

L. D. Bixby, of Bartonsville, Vt., writes: "Four years ago I took a severe cold, which was followed by a terrible cough. I was very sick, and confined to my bed about four months. My physician finally said I was in consumption, and that he could not help me. One of my neighbors advised me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I did so, and before I had taken half a bottle was able to go out. By the time I had finished the bottle I was well, and have remained so ever since."

Alonzo P. Daggett, of Smyrna Mills, Me., writes: "Six years ago, I was a traveling salesman, and at that time was suffering with

Lung Trouble.

For months I was unable to rest nights. I could seldom lie down, had frequent choking spells, and was often compelled to seek the open air for relief. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which helped me. Its continued use has entirely cured me, and, I believe, saved my life."

No Universal Remedy

has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,

which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.

Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.

That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.

All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.

"Good-bye."

I came again to-night, that same sad feeling
That long ago I thought had passed away;
That one old wound that still resists all healing;
That pain not even time can quite allay.
The mists close in, but faintly through them stealing
I catch an echo which will never die;
For, all the memories of the past unsealing,
Come those two tearful words of hers, "Good-bye!"

A touch of hands, few, hasty words, in parting—
I see and hear it all again to-night;
A host of recollections now upstarting
Bring the whole scene again before my sight.
Good-bye!" The low sweet voice that spoke it faltered;
The eyes were dimmed that shone so bright and shy.
The memory of those words has never altered—
Those two sad whispered words of hers, "Good-bye!"

What might have been! God only knows; we never
Can draw the curtains from the dim unknown;
And yet, and yet, before me rises ever—
But fainter since the shadows deeper grown
Have fallen on my heart and brought it sadness—
A vision of her face, the one strong tie
That carries with it somewhat of the gladness
I knew before those words of hers, "Good-bye!"

The music in my soul can never brighten;
The minor chords are all that sound to-day;
And mournful strains, which nothing seems to lighten,
My life, my soul, my very being sway.
The harmony is incomplete: her fingers
Could touch the chords and swell the music high;
Now, in the notes a painful discord lingers,
For the sweetest string was broken by those words, "Good bye!"

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

It was an unutterable relief to the weary woman to find herself alone in a second-class compartment speeding away from the great wilderness of London, where she had known so much misery—away from the glare and dust and hot sun—away from the smoke and dirt, the noise and wretchedness of the house where she had lodged.

"It will be easier and pleasanter to die in the country," she said, half aloud, with a faint little smile, "under a blue sky, and it will be easier to sleep in fields than here."

She shuddered a little as she thought of the room she would not see again, although all her worldly possessions were in it, and then leaned back in her corner, resting her head against the back of the carriage and looking out of the open window, through which, as London was left behind, the soft fresh air came in with such pleasant refreshment.

The rest and quiet and solitude were inexpressibly welcome to her; the wild, hunted expression died out of her eyes as she leaned back on the padded seat; and now, with her veil thrown back and the weary lines smoothed from the still lovely face, one who had known her in former days might perhaps have recognised in Mrs. Grant the rejected applicant of the agency office, the terrified fugitive, the once brilliant and beautiful and admired and envied Lady Glynn.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

The rays of the sun, setting over the western hills beyond the pretty village of Erindale, seemed to linger tenderly upon the scene of unusual beauty which they were filling with golden light—green fields, fresh and fragrant, studded with yellow buttercups and silver daisies, full-leaved trees, a wood in the distance, the village lying in the valley with its pretty cottages, and the quaint red-brick school-house standing on the hill. Down the road was the pretty gray-stone lodge at the gates of Erindale Park, where the only great people in the village lived—the Squire, Sir Frederic Oliphant, his wife, the gentle, kindly, stately lady of the manor, and Miss Madge, their only daughter—sweet, bright-eyed, madcap Madge, who could be so full of fun and yet so full of tenderness, who had never had a care of her own in the world, but who could nevertheless sympathize with the cares of others with a gentleness which was so great a consolation to them all.

Not that there was much care or trouble at Erindale. The villagers were chiefly well to do, and those who were not so received such help from the people at the Hall that they never knew the biting misery of want. Not many villages, even in "merrie England," were so greatly favored as Erindale, for it was not only beautifully and healthily situated, and so blessed by Nature, but Sir Frederic, who had a hobby for improving, had brought all kinds of modern innovations to bear upon the land and the cottages, so that it might well have passed for a model village.

If Sir Frederic had a hobby for improvements, Lady Oliphant had a steed of her own likewise. Her hobby was the village schools; and she devoted much time and money to them, and not only time and money, but a great deal of good sense which saw that the children's instruction consisted of those branches of education which were likely to be of use to them in their future lives.

Altogether Erindale was a model little settlement; and the Oliphants spent nearly the entire year at home; Lady Oliphant being hardly strong enough for travelling, and Sir Frederic and Madge both preferring Erindale to every other place on earth.

The red light of the setting sun which fell upon the little ivy-grown lodge and down the road with the tall leafy hedges on either side, fell also on a pretty little pony-carriage containing two ladies who were driving slowly homeward. Lady Oliphant and her daughter were alone—they usually drove out unattended in the golden summer evenings—and the girl was chattering gayly, as was her wont, while Lady Oliphant was listening and smiling indulgently at Madge's merry speeches.

"There is Mrs. Ford at the gate, mamma," Madge said, as the lodge came into view. "She looks very important. I am sure she has something to tell us. I wonder what it can be? Shall I drive slowly to have the pleasure of trying to guess what it is, or shall I drive fast and so spare myself the agony of suspense and the pleasure of anticipation?"

"I think I should drive fast," Lady Oliphant said laughingly, "unless the pleasures of anticipation are greater than the agony of suspense."

"Ah!" Madge ejaculated. "I am afraid, mamma, that I am very curious and inquisitive; so I will drive on. From whom could I have inherited that little failing? Not from papa certainly, because he is the least inquisitive of mortals."

"Saucy girl! Ah, Mrs. Ford, what a pleasant evening! Were you waiting for little Joe?"

"No, my lady," said the lodge-keeper, courtesying, "I was waiting for your ladyship. I was hoping you would return this way, as you went out by the other gate."

"You wanted to see me?"

"If you please, my lady. If you and Miss Madge would be kind enough to get out and come in for a moment, I have something to show you."

"Of course we will get out," said Madge quickly; then, turning to her mother—"What did I tell you, mamma? I said nurse had something to tell us or something to show us. Take care, dear"—carefully assisting her mother to alight. "That's right, Joe; stand at their heads. You need not touch them. Stand still, my beauties!" And, with a parting pat of her little gloved hand on the ponies' heads, she followed her mother into the lodge.

The lodge door opened into a comfortable little sitting-room, furnished in a rather heavy and substantial manner, a room where Madge had spent many a pleasant hour in her childhood, for Mrs. Ford had been her nurse, and had married from the Hall, where her husband, since dead, had been coachman. She was a kindly-looking woman, plump and short, with a pleasant rosy face, which wore a very pitiful expression just now, as she bent over a woman lying on the horsehair sofa, her head resting back upon it, her eyes closed, and her face as pale as death itself. Lady Oliphant stood looking at her in silence; Madge drew nearer the sofa.

"What a lovely face! Who is she, nursie? Mamma dear, what is the matter Is she asleep or has she fainted?"

"I think she is asleep now, Miss Madge, half asleep and half stupefied," Mrs. Ford said. "She looks very ill, poor pretty!"

"Very ill," Lady Oliphant said. "How did she come here, Ford?"

"I will tell you, my lady. It was this morning, just as little Joe was coming home from school, he ran in saying there was a lady sitting by the roadside who seemed very tired. I went out to her and asked her if she would come in and rest a little. When I spoke to her, she looked up at me with such pitiful eyes, my lady, and she said in such low faint tones that she could not—she was too tired. She was that exhausted, my lady, that I was obliged almost to carry her into the house, and she dropped down there on the sofa just as you see her. I asked her if she had been ill, and she shook her head; she had walked a long way, she said. I brought her some bread and milk, and at first she drank so eagerly and tried to eat that—oh, my lady, it seems strange to say it and she so nicely dressed, but I think she had not tasted food for a long time!"

"Oh, nurse!" Madge said tremulously.

"It's true, Miss Madge, I am afraid; but very little satisfied her, and then she fell back and looked round the room, as if she wondered where she was, and was bewildered like, then closed her eyes, and ever since she has remained like this, my lady, just as you see her."

"Poor thing!" Lady Oliphant said gently. "She looks like a lady too. I wonder who she is, and what could have brought her to such a condition?"

"She looks well-nigh starved," remarked Mrs. Ford, with a tremor in her kind voice. "Just look at her hands, my lady."

"Madge dear, take care," her mother said gently for Madge was kneeling by the sofa now and touching the sleeping woman with gentle fingers, raising her a little, and putting her more comfortably on the sofa.

"I will not wake her, mother. Poor thing, how ill she looks!" Madge's sweet voice was full of pain. "She is almost like death, is she not? She ought to be in bed. Mamma, shall we take her home?

"My darling, she will be better with nurse," Lady Oliphant said. "Nurse will take care of her until she is better, I know, and—" She broke off, for there was a perceptible quiver of the heavy white lids, and the stranger opened her eyes and looked about, at first dreamily and wonderingly, then with a sudden light of recognition, as they rested upon Mrs. Ford's kindly face.

"I have been asleep," she said faintly "Forgive me. I am better now, and I will go."

"You will not stir," Madge said, gently putting her back upon the sofa, and bending over her with her sweet, coaxing face. "You are too tired for anything but rest. Nursie, have you any tea made? I am sure she would like some tea."

The sweet wondering eyes went to Madge's face wistfully, then passed on to Lady Oliphant's.

"You must not think of stirring yet," Lady Oliphant said. "Perhaps you are a stranger in this neighborhood. If so, it will be better for you to remain here with Mrs. Ford for a day or two."

"You are very good, but—"

"I shall have much pleasure in writing or telegraphing to your friends, if you will allow me," said her ladyship.

"I have no friends to whom—" The slow tears rose heavily to her eyes now, and her lips quivered so that speech was almost an impossibility.

Madge, coming to her side with some tea and a slice of delicately cut bread and butter, stopped her gently.

"You must not talk," she said. "You must drink this and lie still. There—there, poor thing!"

She put down the tea hastily, and caught her in her strong, young arms, and the passion of tears which followed were shed upon Madge Oliphant's shoulder, while Lady Oliphant, her own eyes dim, took the little wasted hand, and stroked it gently.

It was pretty to see how Madge soothed her and laid her back on the pillows, and held the strong, fragrant tea to the parched, shaking lips, and waited on her deftly and tenderly, all her warm girlish sympathies enlisted in behalf of this poor, solitary stranger who was so lovely and so fragile. And it was touching to see how the wistful, yearning eyes followed Madge as she moved about the room, and how the little fingers clung to her hand when Lady Oliphant rose and said gently that they must leave her to her rest now; but that they would see her in the morning; and, while she went out to say a few words to Mrs. Ford about the poor waif whom she had succored, Shirley—for it was she—tried to thank Madge with shaking lips.

"How good you are! How can I thank you?" she said unsteadily; and Madge smiled and kissed her, and told her that she would see her in the morning, and went back to her own happy, luxurious home, her thought and heart full of the poor stranger who was so lovely and so sad.

Mrs. Ford assisted her guest up the little narrow staircase, and undressed her and laid her in the soft lavender-scented bed in the little spare room. Shirley was weak enough to be helpless as a child in her strong motherly hands; and when she had drunk the hot drink Mrs. Ford prepared for her, she lay back on the pillow and slept long and heavily, awaking when the sun was high in the heavens, to partake of some tea and toast which Mrs. Ford brought to the bedside, then sinking to sleep again—the long dreamless sleep of exhaustion and prostration.

It was evening when she awoke, and she was alone in the little room. She felt stronger and better, and getting out of bed, managed with slow languid movements to dress herself and creep down stairs to the little sitting-room, where Mrs. Ford greeted her with a cry of surprise.

"Dear heart alive!" she exclaimed. "Are you better? How pleased Miss Madge will be! She has been down two or three times to ask after you, and she and her ladyship will be back here on their way home.

"How can I thank you for all your kindness?" Shirley said tremulously; and she went up to the good woman and put her arms round her neck and kissed her.

"La, my dear, there's nothing to thank me for," said Mrs. Ford rather unsteadily. "One as would not do a kindness for another is not fit to live, in my opinion, and her ladyship and Miss Madge are that kind that they'd make one feel ashamed not to be so sometimes when occasion offers. Yes grand as her ladyship is, she's never grand with us poor folks; and she'll be good to you if you need it."

Shirley smiled faintly; it was all part of a terrible dream, she thought. Surely she would awaken some day, and find that she had been asleep a long, long time, and had dreamed that her husband was dead, and that he had been murdered, and that Guy had been tried for his life for the murder, and that she had come away in the dawn, and had walked many miles to the next station, so as to avoid the chance of Guy's following her!

A dream! Was it a dream? Had those long weeks in London, those bitter winter months when she had scarcely left the miserable lodging where she had taken refuge, not really existed? Had those spring days, with their winds and long interminable evenings, passed only in her imagination? Ah, no—they were all realities! But that suffering was over! She had left London far behind on that July day—was it a week ago?—when she had taken a ticket for Hereford, and left the train when it stopped at a little station on the line; and then she had wandered on her way, sleeping under the blue sky, under a tree or haystack, eating a bit of bread as long as er money—one shilling—lasted to procure it, and then sinking down wearily by the road-side, to die, as she thought, of want, of sheer hunger, of starvation. Ay, and such would have been her end had it not been for the good Samaritan who had taken her in and fed and sheltered her; and the hazel eyes went gratefully to the portly figure in a lilac print gown and snow-white apron which moved about the room on hospitable cares intent.

And yet could it be possible? It must be a dream! That she who had been used to such lavish expenditure, who had had the command of more money than she could throw away on her whims and extravagances and pleasures, should have been brought to such want as that she should be starving, dying for the want of a bit of bread—it must be a dream; it could not be true.

Three or four times she had felt the same confusion in her mind; she could not think connectedly, she could not remember the names of the villages she had passed, she could not remember her brother's address in India. She thought she might venture to write to him now and let him know where she was, and ask him if he could come to her. But what could she say to him? What address could she give him to write to her? Poor Jack, how grieved he would be if he knew how ill and solitary she was, and how—

"Drink this, honey," said Mrs. Ford's kindly voice, as she brought a basin of beef-tea to her side. "Miss Madge won't be glad to see such pale cheeks. That's right; that'll hearten you up a bit. And this is a glass of Sir Frederic's own port. Miss Madge carried some down herself this morning. Nay, you must drink it every drop; and then you shall sit by the window and watch for them."

"Thank you," Shirley said gratefully, as she obeyed; and, leaning back in the old chintz-covered arm-chair by the window, she looked down the road, which was flooded with the golden light of the setting sun.

"Miss Madge is such a kind young lady," Mrs. Ford resumed—she was never weary of singing her young lady's praise—"and that thoughtful and considerate! And she's so gay and bright that to see her coming along the road smiling at one is as good as a ray of sunshine on a winter day."

"She is very good and sweet and pretty," Shirley answered, in a tone of such heartfelt gratitude that it pleased Mrs. Ford, and she continued—

"And, although they have a visitor at the Hall, she was down here the first thing to know how you were. She says you have the loveliest face she ever saw," she went on, with an approving glance at Shirley, which at any other time would have made her smile. "She's not a bit stuck up, isn't Miss Madge. The gentleman who is visiting at the Hall is courting her, Collins says—Collins is Miss Madge's maid—and, although I think him much too old and grave for Miss Madge, I can't help sayin' that he's a fine man and a real gentleman—and he seems that fond of Miss Madge that he worships the ground she walks on."

"He will be a very fortunate man to win such a wife," Shirley said gently. "Miss Madge deserves to be happy."

"Ay, that she does!" was the warm answer. "Besides, she is a great heiress is Miss Madge. Sir Frederic's property does not go to his male relations; it will all go to Miss Madge. But it is not her property this gentleman wants, for they say he's as rich as a Jew. At the same time," continued Mrs. Ford, in a lower tone, "I should not give him Miss Madge if I were the squire."

"Why not?" Shirley asked, absently.

"My reasons is good ones," Mrs. Ford answered rather mysteriously. "But I keep them to myself. However, Sir Frederic is the best judge, after all. You'll see him presently, Mrs.—Mrs.—"

She hesitated, looking at Shirley inquiringly.

"Grant," Shirley said faintly.

"You are a widow, I suppose? Ah, poor thing, it is a sad thing to lose a husband! I've been through that trouble myself, so I know what it is." She shook her head sorrowfully, then resumed in a brisker tone—"Well, Mrs. Grant, you'll see him presently, for he's out driving with Miss Madge and her ladyship, and Miss Madge is coming back this way."

"I shall be glad to have an opportunity of thanking her," Shirley said gently; and Mrs. Ford left her by the window.

Presently the quick trot of Miss Oliphant's ponies was heard, and the pretty dainty little carriage appeared in sight. Madge was driving, as usual, and she was turning her fair face backward to look at a gentleman in the back seat, who was bending toward her and smiling at something she was saying to him—a tall man with a gray, haggard face, whom Shirley recognized at once. Miss Oliphant's suitor was Guy Stuart.

CHAPTER XL.

For a moment Shirley sat watching the approaching vehicle, taking in clearly the tenderness in Guy Stuart's face as he bent toward Madge Oliphant, the bright smile on the girl's fair face, and the quiet pleasure on her mother's; then, with quick, frightened steps, she ran up the little narrow stairs and into the room where she had slept, bolting the door behind her, in a paroxysm of terror.

What could she do? Whither could she go? That she should have come here, of all places in the world—that Guy should be at Erindale—that this should be the end of all the misery she had endured—that, after all her wandering, he should find her here!

How had he found her out? Who had betrayed her to him? How could she escape?

She glanced wildly around her; then she remembered Mrs. Ford's words that the gentleman who was courting Miss Oliphant was out driving with her; and she breathed more freely. He did not know she was there; she might still conceal herself; she might escape after all. And yet to go out once more into the world to face the same misery again? How could she? Ah, why had they saved her for this? Why had they not let her die by the road-side? It would have been kinder! The death-pang would have been over now; and what had life for her that she should cling to it?

Composing herself somewhat by a strong effort of will she stood waiting, wondering what was coming next. She heard Mrs. Ford's exclamations of surprise as she entered the little sitting-room to greet her visitors, and Madge Oliphant's bright voice mingling with the deep rich tones she knew so well, and which thrilled her through and through even now. Then she heard the pony-carriage move on into the park, and she peeped out of the window. Guy had taken Madge's place and was driving away, and Shirley sunk down by the window-sill, holding it with trembling fingers, utterly unnerved at her narrow escape from discovery.

A light knock at the door made her start up; and, when she opened it, Madge was standing on the little landing, such a pretty picture of youth and happiness and beauty in her dainty white dress and azure-blue ribbons that Shirley's eyes brightened at sight of her.

"May I come in? Nurse told me that you must have only just come up," she said, in her bright girlish voice. "You are better? I am so glad!"

She had taken Shirley's hand with a pretty pleasant cordiality, and drew her toward the window, where the light would fall upon her, looking at her with gentle, compassionate eyes.

"Yes, you are better; but you are very pale still. I shall not be quite happy until I see you growing roses like mine. Tell me, are you feeling stronger?"

"Much stronger," Shirley answered, in her sweet, unsteady voice, whose low pathetic tones contrasted as greatly with Madge Oliphant's bright voice as the frail slender woman in black, with the white face and weary eyes, contrasted with the bright golden-haired girl in her embroidery and azure-blue ribbons.

"Much stronger!" Madge repeated, smiling. "I am afraid not much; still I think you are better. You had such a nice long sleep, it ought to have done you good."

As she spoke she had gently forced Shirley to sit down on the low window-seat, and, still keeping Shirley's hand in hers, she knelt down by her side. There was a brief silence, which Shirley broke by trying to return a few words of thanks for the kindness she had received; but Miss Oliphant stopped her at once.

"I do not think you want to hurt me," she said, with a gentle seriousness which sat charmingly on the sweet young face; "but you will do so if you talk in that strain. Mamma and I were so glad to be of any service to you," she added, wistfully, wishing this beautiful stranger would be a little confiding, and tell her what the dreadful trouble was that was looking out of the great sad eyes and trembling on the sweet lips.

"You have been very good," Shirley answered, gently, as she caught the pretty fingers and pressed them to her lips.

"And you are very naughty," Madge said, shyly, coloring all over her sweet face, as if the caress had come from bearded lips instead of from a woman's mouth; "and I would scold you, only you are fit for nothing but to be petted just now."

With a pretty shy grace she put her charming face down on Shirley's hands, and left a soft kiss there. When she lifted her head she took the slender wasted hands and caressed them softly.

"Such little thin fingers!" she said, smiling. "I must see them much plumper than that before I let you leave us—although," she added eagerly, coloring a little, "mamma and I both hope you mean to stay with us."

"You are very good," Shirley answered, tremulously, "but—you see—I must find something to do, and—"

"Oh, I am so glad!" burst out impulsive Madge. "I was afraid you were not—I mean that I feared you were not obliged—very stupid at expressing myself," she said, laughingly; "but indeed I am selfish enough to be glad that you want work, because now we shall keep you here!"

"But—" Shirley began, unsteadily.

"'But me no buts!'" said Madge, brightly. "You must not try to oppose me, Mrs. Grant. I have set my mind on keeping you here, and here you will stay, because I am a spoiled child and always have my own way. And this bright, sweet air of ours will make you quite strong again."

Shirley shook her head sorrowfully. How could she stay where she ran daily risk of meeting Guy? And yet whither could she go?

Interesting Phenomena at Sea.

The Anchor Liner Anchoria, just arrived from New York after a quick run, reports as follows: About 350 miles east of the American coast and on the borders of the Gulf stream, the vessel passed through phenomena which, although frequent on a small scale, are extremely rare on such maximum grandeur of scale as that which enraptured the observers on the Anchoria. After the vessel had been running over twenty-four hours in a dense fog, the water around suddenly became so luminous that the mile-long shoals of small fish darting around the vessel seeking refuge from the sharks and other devouring enemies, gave the sea the appearance of a vast cauldron of boiling jewels, while the furrows of foam from the great ship's bows rolled in such blazing masses of light violet flame as rendered the smallest thread in the ship's rigging as clearly visible as the bright sunshine, and enveloped the vessel in such a mass of dazzling light violet-colored glare, that the engines had to be slowed a few hours until a storm of wind, bursting out from the northwest, cleared off the fog and broke the whole visible surface of the ocean into flying crests of flame-like foam of such brilliancy that the whole ocean seemed ablaze with fleeting, flashing flame, the whole horizon line having the appearance of an immense belt of light-blue fire. In short, the whole phenomenon was such a one as is rarely seen, the oldest and widest travelled seamen and officers never having seen anything at all to compare with it. This beautiful pyrotechnic display of nature lasted from 11 p. m. until 3.30 a. m., until lost in the eclipsing light of dawn.—Glasgow Herald.

A REMARKABLE COLONY.

Crime That Resulted in the Evolution of a New People.

Mutiny on a British Man of War Leads to the Development of a New Race—Advantages of Civilization Without Its Attendant Vices.

The ship Bounty, December 23rd, 1787, sailed from Spithead, England, bound for the South Sea. The ship was under a commission from the British Admiralty to visit the Society and other islands and collect a number of the bread fruit plants, which were to be taken to certain of the British West Indies for the purpose of stocking those islands. The vessel started on her homeward voyage with Lieut. Bligh in command. He was of an unusually overbearing and insulting disposition. He accused Fletcher Christian, the mate, with having stolen some cocoanuts which he had bought at Otaheite, one of the islands they had visited. Christian determined to get away from the ship and was informed by the boatswain that the crew were ready to mutiny. He surprised the captain in his berth, made a prisoner of him and took possession of the ship. The captain and eighteen of his officers and men were then set adrift in an open boat. Christian, with the twenty-four others who had remained in the ship, steered for the Society Island, and sixteen of them finally decided to remain at Otaheite, while Christian and the rest, taking with them twelve Otaheitean women and seven men, set sail in the ship for any place that chance might take them. Nothing was heard of Christian and those who had gone on the Bounty for twenty years. At the end of that time an American ship happening to touch at Pitcairn's Island, found there an Englishman called Alexander Smith (his name was afterwards changed to John Adams), who said he was the sole survivor of those who had sailed on the Bounty. Christian, thinking the island a place where there would be little chance of their being discovered, had landed there and burned the ship. Things went smoothly for two years, when one of the men, having lost his wife, insisted on taking one of the Otaheitean men's. The Otaheiteans rebelled and killed three of the whites. The rest of the whites, with the aid of the women, then killed all the Otaheitean men. Only four men were now left on the island. One of these succeeded in making an intoxicating liquor and drank himself to death; another one was executed by his companions, and a third died of consumption. Adams, now an old man, became at last impressed with the responsibility resting upon him of teaching the descendants of himself and his companions the truths of the Bible. The result was a model community. In 1830 the inhabitants moved to Norfolk Island, but in 1856 a part of them returned to Pitcairn. This colony has since been remarkable for the purity in which it has retained the principles inculcated by the patriarchal Adams. Between the years 1860 and 1880 a number of ships called at the island. In 1883 the American ship Harry Mills visited the place, and one of the inhabitants, named McCoy, accompanied the ship to Liverpool. In the same year another American ship, the Wandering Jew, stopped at the island and on leaving Capt. Talpey, the commander, took with him another one of the inhabitants. This was Ernest Heywood Christian, the great grandson of Fletcher Christian. Until his arrival at Hull, England, Ernest Christian had never seen a house, a horse, or any quadruped. His delight and astonishment when he first saw a steam engine and train were unbounded. On his arrival Christian was treated with the greatest kindness, and when he left England he took with him many valuable presents for the islanders. Christian spent three years on the ship, visiting San Francisco, and going completely around the world before he returned to his island home. On her second visit to Pitcairn Mrs. Talpey had with her a young English girl, 17 years old. She was the youngest person who had ever visited the island, and great was the admiration and interest she excited among the girls of her own age. One in particular, Miss Emily McCoy, kept close to her all the time, asking her all manner of questions about the outside world.

"You are the first girl of my own age, outside of this island, that I have ever seen," she said. "Tell me all you can. What do horse cars look like? And the churches—do you have people enough to fill them?"

Among the island women who visited the ship on this occasion was Miss Rosalind Young, one of the most attractive and enterprising on the island. She was at this time about 23 years old, had never had a shoe on her foot, swam like a fish, played the organ in the little island church, assisted her father in teaching the "village school" and was the leader in everything among the women on the island. She has written an account of the island for the Century, and she told Mrs. Talpey that she never had an idle moment.

Another curious vein of modern civilization that has cropped out on the island is the desire for some place where one can get a rest and change from the ordinary routine of life. On the isolated island, only a few miles in circumference, in mid-ocean and containing only one village of less than 100 inhabitants, "summer residences" would seem to be hardly practicable or desirable. Yet these people have already begun to build, a little way from the main settlement, a small "summer colony," where the older ones may go away for a little while every year and be more retired than they can in the village. They have named their retreat "Happy Valley."

The condition of the islanders has lately been considerably improved by the numerous visits of English and American ships. The population is increasing slowly. In 1879 it was 94. In December, 1882, it was 108, of which number 2 were shipwrecked sailors who had settled there. The colony consists of about 20 families, who live in single story cottages formed of bamboo, with thatched roofs. The islanders are still noted for their strict religious conduct, grace being said before and after each meal, and swearing or anything of a similar character being absolutely unknown. When any dispute arises among them the settlement of it is laid over till the next arrival of a man of war, when it is referred to the captain, and his decision is final.—New York Press.

SLEEPLESSNESS.

Described by One Who Has Evidently Experienced Its Misery.

To say that sleeplessness is largely on the increase in this country is but to reiterate what our best medical authorities say on the subject. There are, undoubtedly, various causes which produce this disease, of which indigestion is the most prevalent. Only those who have suffered from this hopeless disease know of its debilitating effects upon the system. When it reaches the chronic state there is scarcely any alleviation; sedatives and opiates, as administered in other diseases for their quieting effects on the system, in this disease frequently have a contrary effect. When one retires for the night it is impossible to know with any degree of certainty whether they have lain down to recuperate their wasted energies by sleep, or to toss to and fro in utter wretchedness during the greater part of the night. Sympathetic members of your family say to you, "Now lie perfectly quiet and stop thinking and you will soon drop off to sleep." Stop thinking, indeed! One might as well try to stop old Boreas in a gale as to stop thinking on one of these restless nights. More ideas race through your mind in one hour than you have thought of in the past year. Like a panorama, ideas and scenes come and go until dissolved into other thoughts and scenes equally as difficult to dismiss. As the hour of midnight approaches, you mentally exclaim, "Oh, if I could only stop thinking I should go to sleep!" This recalls to your mind what you have read about the great Napoleon Bonaparte who, in the midst of battle, could lie down beside a cannon and by mere will power go to sleep. But alas! you find you have no will power left. If you are a housekeeper you perhaps resolve not to worry about the disasters connected with the household machinery, but find that the cares of the house are so closely woven into your very life that you cannot dismiss them from your mind. Directly, bang goes something that sounds like the outside cellar door, and you almost know that John has forgotten to fasten it, and perhaps some one may be rifling the cellar. But as the noise is not repeated you at length give up that idea. Then as your circle of thought begins to narrow you concentrate it upon the bed. You discover that there are lumps in the mattrass, and that the pillows are hard, for both ears ache from lying on them, and you mentally feel that our modern beds must have been made for discipline rather than comfort. Soon after, another fact asserts itself—your arms and lower limbs have a peculiar sensation and you are obliged to change their position to keep them from becoming cramped; while your hand is almost pressed to bursting, your heart beats as if trying to break down the very walls of its prison house, and everything appears to you as if the world was upside down. Thoughts and scenes are so blended together that you cannot separate them, and within you there is a consciousness that you are going to sleep. You feel uncomfortably warm, and you soon begin to perspire, suggestive that the fever in your system has spent itself; and soon the circulation becomes normal, and you drop off unconsciously into an unrefreshing sleep, which may continue for several hours if you are not disturbed. Where sleeplessness is caused by indigestion the most positive relief that I know of is to be careful of the diet, of over-exerting and over-taxing the nervous system; or in other words carefully avoid doing whatever has a tendency to produce it.—Country Gentleman.

The Music of Niagara.

In an article on "Niagara Falls," an evening paper observes, anent the mighty roar of its waters: "One can never forget the effect of listening to this mighty voice for the first time, nor is it an unpleasant sound which assails the ear. The roar is positively musical, they say, and a few years ago a distinguished American organist spent a long time in studying it, and trying to learn the measure and compass of its tones. He finally came to the conclusion that the deepest tone by the falling cataract was that which would be produced by an organ pipe about 160 feet in length and of proportionate dimensions as organ pipes are made. Now, 160 feet, which is about the height of the falls (this varies from 160 to nearly 180 feet), is much longer than any organ pipe is made, and the sound emitted by such a pipe would not be sensible to us as a musical sound. Therefore our ears could not apprehend the music of the deepest tones; and as our ears are at fault, we give this deep toned music such discordant epithets as noise and roar." This story, according to one account, seems incorrectly stated. The organist in question suggested a sound not nearly three octaves below thirty-two feet C, but about F sharp below that note. The present writer tried to define the vast harmonic hum of the great waterfalls, and came to the conclusion that the task was all but hopeless, although a steady kind of a tone seems to be maintained; and certainly the imagination might readily seize upon such a note as the authority in question named, but whether the indefinite sound could be described as of a foundation or upper partial tones character it would be impossible to say.—London Musical World.

STRANGE EDIBLES.

Fried Toad-Fish, Boiled Shark and Stewed Devil-Fish as Palatable Dishes.

"Little you know of European delights," said a bon vivant to a Galveston News reporter, "if you have never tasted the flesh of a shark or reveled in devil-fish stew."

"All fish," continued the speaker, "are edible, but some are, by popular prejudice, adjudged to be unfit for the table. Who would ever dream of eating a toad-fish? The appearance of the creature, with its hideous head and brown spotted sides, is sufficient to take away any man's appetite; yet the flesh is tender and palatable. When fried it tastes very much like flounder. Sharks are also excellent eating. They are plentiful in these waters, and, if people could be made to believe that there flesh is wholesome and agreeable to the palate, an excellent fish would be sold in the market at a remarkably low price.

"Shark flesh is firm, and in taste hardly distinguishable from redfish. A delicious soup can be made from the fins. The meat is best when boiled or fried in oil. The devil-fish, or giant squid, some times seen on this coast, is the same creature of which Victor Hugo wrote in his novel, "The Toilers of the Sea." It is known to scientists as the octopus. In appearance it is a horrible monster, with a huge head and body furnished with snake-like feelers, which some times grow to be thirty feet in length, and are as powerful in their grasp as the grip of a Sixth ward politician on election boodle."

"You do not mean to tell me," queried the reporter, "that the flesh of such a creature is edible?"

"It is simply delicious when properly prepared. It should be cut into small pieces and stewed with herbs. It becomes then a jelly-like substance of delicate flavor that melts in the mouth. I regard the flesh of a devil-fish as a delicacy. There is another species of devil-fish which resembles a skate or ray fish. The largest of them weigh from 100 to 150 pounds. It is excellent eating."

The reporter intimated that his informant might possibly be filling him with stories originally intended for the marines, which the bon vivant bitterly resented, and the two parted, the last words coming from the latter, who continued to assert:

"Sharks is good eatin', and if you don't believe me go and try for yourself. The bay is full of 'em."

The reporter having seen the varied contents of more than one shark's stomach, was compelled to confess a prejudice, and thought the flesh, while too rich for reportorial blood, might be utilized on the county poor farm.

Making Saratoga Chips.

Saratoga chips, as all know who have ever seen or tasted the article, are made from potatoes, says the Pittsburg Dispatch. The process of manufacture is a very simple one, the only machinery used, if such simple tools can be called machinery, consists of a parer and a slicer. The former is composed of a round piece of tin, one end of which serves as a handle, while the other contains a knife so set that it will cut only a thin paring. The latter consists of a knife, set in a wheel-shaped contrivance, which, on being turned by a crank, cuts the potato into slices of the requisite thickness. Only the best of potatoes can be used, and even then there is great waste, as all "specks" and other imperfections must be carefully cut out. After the potatoes are sliced they are placed in water and allowed to remain several hours, being stirred occasionally. This is for the purpose of removing the starch, which, if allowed to remain, would cause the chips to become sour. The slices are then ready for boiling. A large kettle, set in a brick arch, in which a natural gas fire is burning, is kept nearly full of hot lard. Enough of the slices are placed in the kettle to cover the surface, when they are boiled until they become crisp and brown. They are then ladled out, sprinkled with salt, and placed in a sieve to dry. After cooling the chips are ready for packing. They are put in stout paper boxes, one-half pound in each box, and retailed for fifteen cents per package.

HOW TO MAKE A TENT.

Some Information for Boys Who Are Going to Camp Out This Summer.

Boys always begin to think about camp-out-out equipments as soon as spring fairly sets in. The most important thing to provide for such an expedition is a tent, and as it costs a good deal of money to have one made to order, perhaps the boys who intend to spend a few days in the woods this summer would like to know how to make one themselves and at a trifling cost. Buy nine yards of good stout yard-wide cotton cloth and cut into three strips of three yards each. Sew these strips together securely by overlapping, and you will then have a piece three yards square. Make a solution of twelve ounces of lime and five ounces of alum in three gallons of water, and soak the cotton in it for a day. Rinse it in warm rain water and stretch in the sun to dry. It will then be waterproof.

Having reached your camping-out place, cut two poles eight feet long, each with a fork at one end. Sink the other ends in the ground about a foot and beat the earth well to keep them firmly in place. These poles should be about eight feet apart. Now cut another pole about nine feet long and put it on top of the other two, resting in the forks. Cut two more poles ten feet long for the sides of your frame, resting one end of each pole on the cross pole and the other end on the ground. Stretch the canvas over the frame and tack it to the poles. You can make the sides of your tent weather-proof with the boughs of cedar and other trees. This is the simplest and least expensive tent you can have, and it will answer your purposes fully. The interior of the tent, however, would be a little more roomy and comfortable if you would put up a second frame in the rear similar to that in front, say two feet high, and stretch the canvas over that and thence to the ground. Select sloping ground to put your tent on, so that if it rains the water will readily run off; and also dig a little ditch around the tent with an outlet leading down the incline. As the front of the tent will be open—unless you choose to provide enough canvas to close it—you had better place it with the front towards the north or northwest, for storms, if you have any, will probably come from the south or the southwest.

The rude hut described—for it is little else—will no doubt seem a flimsy shelter to those who have never occupied one, but for perfect rest and the soundest of sound sleeping you will find it superior to the best room in your city house.—Chicago Tribune.

Cemetery Decorum.

Mr. J. C. Olmsted, in Garden and Forest, takes strong exception to the monumental monstrosities to be found in some modern cemeteries. He prefers the simple graves, such as are often to be seen near farm houses, bordered by wild flowers, lying peacefully and unobtrusive, to the miracles in stone and iron fencing, often standing in inharmonious proximity in suburban burying grounds. How much more appropriate modest grave stones than the big, staringly white Egyptian obelisks, broken topped Greek columns, Roman urns, weeping Italian angels, Renaissance canopies, Gothic spires and all the other kinds of showy monuments, and where all restfulness and seclusion are annihilated by rows upon rows and scattering swarms of factory-made, white marble grave stones, all set up on edge so as to be as conspicuous as possible, and looking as though they would be heaved out of plumb by every frost. And as if all these white monuments and grave stones were not enough to frighten Nature into submission, innumerable fences are added, mostly of a sort which may be described as the "this-is-the-most-show-you-can-get-for-your-money" cast iron fence. And, as iron rusts into a color which is somewhat harmonious with nature, such a catastrophe is generally avoided by painting all iron work a gloomy black, or vivid white, or by gilding it, like a cresting over a chromo tea store. The writer thinks that the managers of country cemeteries should establish a rule limiting fences to those that are necessary, and requiring these to be in comformity with some general scheme devised with due regard to harmony with and strict subordination to nature. There shall be a like subordination to nature in all other artificial constructions, such as retaining walls, bridges, roads, walks, gutters, steps, guide posts, vault fronts and so on. They should avoid formality and artificiality in all things and at all times, for they should remember that they have set out to make a rural cemetery and not an architectural one.

The Population of Mexico.

Possibly there are 1,500,000 white men, properly so called, in Mexico, and, as I have shown, they are differentiated among themselves by climate. Then there are mixed bloods to the number of about 2,500,000 approximately, and these, scattered over the republic, differ in many ways through climatic causes. Then come about 6,000,000 Indians, some very much civilized, some semi-civilized and others barbarous. Of the barbarous Indians some are peaceful enough, and others, like the Chan Santa Cruz Indians of the Yucantan peninsula, are fierce and warlike. The Yaquis of Sonora may be taken as examples of semi-civilized Indians. These Indian races speak different languages, though many tribes use Spanish to a greater or less extent, according to the measure of their contact with white men.

Potatoes and Cigars.

The funniest thing in town, says the Lewiston, Me., Journal, is the mishap of a gentleman whose wife runs the store bill. He has been in the habit of having his cigar bill charged up as potatoes, and the other day his wife took her pencil and began to reckon. She finally found that they had eaten over ten carloads of potatoes the past year and she just didn't believe that the account was right. The grocer and the smoker are now between the upper and nether mill stones, and it is hard to tell who will be pulverized the finest at the close.

Col. A. L. Rives, the father of the young Virginia authoress, is a leading southern engineer, and up to about a year ago he was connected with the Richmond and Danville Railroad. He then accepted an important post on the Panama Ship Canal and soon after went to Panama.

PEN PICTURE OF TIBERIAS.

One of the "Holy Cities" of the Jews—An Old Synagogue—Relics.

Hebron, Jerusalem, Safed and Tiberias became the "holy cities" of the Jews after the Roman persecution had ceased somewhat. The Sanhedrim was at Tiberias for a number of years. Thirteen synagogues were here at one time, each one having a school connected with it as certainly as the present churches have their Sunday schools. A Jewish school of languages became the centre of the Jewish faith. To learn Hebrew from a rabbi of Tiberias is even yet considered a great privilege. The old synagogue carries one back 1,000 years. Its roof is supported by stone arches and columns. In the centre is a great cage-like inclosure, constructed of wood which is dried and twisted by centuries of exposure, but yet as sound as when hewed from the log. This is the reading place. Ascending the steps which lead to the interior, the rabbi opens the scroll and begins to teach the intone. The assembled congregation walk around the cage, muttering and gesturing, some chiming in a high key or imitating the blasts of a trombone through the hands. Some weep as they frantically throw up their arms; others kiss their phylacteries as they fold and unfold them about the left arm and the head; others march around and beat time with their hands and feet. Any reference to the coming of the Messiah excites them to frenzy. Little else remains in Tiberias to interest the student. Relics of the past are found intermingled with the necessities of the present. Disks cut from the syenite columns of the old temple serve as millstones to grind barley for the sons of Mohammed; fine old porphyry columns are thrown upon the ground and hollowed out for public horse troughs; threshing floors are paved with bits of frieze chiseled after Grecian designs paid for by Herod Antipas. The cattle are slaughtered in the public thoroughfares; the streets are hopelessly filthy; the bazaars are unattractive; the people are depressed; and, as the dragoman tells us, "the king of the fleas" resides here. Yet here come the pilgrim Jews to die, in order that their bones may rest close to the tombs of their wise men who have gone before; some declare that here the Messiah will appear.—Edward L. Wilson in the Century.

For Cramps in the Leg.

Many persons of both sexes are greatly troubled with cramps in one or both their legs. It comes on suddenly, and is very severe. Most people jump out of bed (it nearly always comes on either just after going to bed or while undressing) and ask some one to rub the leg. I have known it to last for hours, till in despair they would send for the family physician, and even then it would be hours before the spasm would let up. There is nothing easier than to make the spasm let go its hold, and it can be accomplished without sending for a doctor, who may be tired and in need of a good night's rest. When I have a patient who is subject to cramp I always advise him to provide himself with a good strong cord. A long garter will do if nothing else is handy. When the cramp comes on take the cord, wind it around the leg over the place that is cramped, and take an end in each hand and give it a sharp pull, one that will hurt a little. Instantly the cramp will let up, and the sufferer can go to bed assured it will not come on again that night. For the permanent cure, give about six or eight cells of galvanic battery, with the negative pole applied over the spot that cramps, and the positive pole over the thigh. Give it for ten minutes, and repeat every week for a month. I have saved myself many a good night's rest simply by posting my patients subject to spasm of the legs how to use the cord as above. I have never known it to fail, and I have tried it after they had worked half the night, and the patient was in the most intense agony. Even in such cases, at the first jerk of the cord all pain left.—R. W. St. Clair, M.D., in Medical Age.

Teaching a Wife Sense.

Wife (counting over her change after making a purchase)—I guess he's given me the wrong change. Husband (savagely)—I thought so, I thought so; that's the way my hard-earned money goes. Trust a woman to get fooled. Go back to the counter and get it made right at once. Wife returns to the counter and hands the clerk a $2 bill. Husband—Why, what have you been doing? Wife—Making the change right. He gave me $2 too much. Husband (more savagely than ever)—Well, by jingo, you are an idiot.—Boston Courier.

Pleasant for the Doctor.

A medical missionary nearly lost his life through an outburst of fanaticism at Foochow, China. It seems that the doctor, who was attending a patient with hemorrhage, immediately proceeded to check the latter, in disregard of a native superstition, according to which delay should have been made until the patient's friends had finished consulting the gods in the joss-house. The patient died, and the Chinese would have boiled the doctor in oil but for the courage of some of the converts.—The Lancet.

The Smallness of the Small.

"I would like to start in some business with small means," says a young man. Then, son, do you start a daily paper. Your means will be too powerful small to heft after the fourth pay-day, and so you might just as well have them as small as they can be strained to begin with.

Had Got Used to It.

She wanted to take some lessons in archery, but she was very, very verdant. "Have you a bow and quiver?" asked the teacher. "Ye-ye—yes," she hesitated, "I have a beau, but I haven't a quiver any more. He's been coming for about two months now, and I'm used to it."

Mrs. Cleveland sent a piece of her wedding dress to her friend, Miss Lucy Coffin, who married Charles DeKay in New York Monday. It was in a case with two salt cellars, in the shape of tiny shoes, made of platinum and gold.

Tim Williams, an old hermit of Lebanon, Conn., had a hive of bees which swarmed on a huge apple tree. Fearing that they would escape he climbed the tree after them, but fell and broke his leg, stirring up the bees in his descent. They followed him down and stung him to death.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines.

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermaturrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums units in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

Mr. J. D. Stoddart lost two valuable horses this week. One died on Monday evening from inflammation of the kidneys, and the other on Tuesday morning from being overheated.—[O. S. Times.

We had a pleasant call from Mr. Stewart J. P. of Kimberly on Thursday last. He is a very intelligent gentleman & will no doubt make a very popular and excellent Councillor.—[Thornbury Standard.

Two gents in the neighborhood of Epping had quite an interesting time bagging hens for a young lady a short time ago. The difficulty with the lady now is whether Jimmy or Guss gets the cake.—[Thornbury Standard.

An old man named Smith, a bricklayer, in a family quarrel last evening was brutally illused by his stepson, his eyes being so bruised that he is totally unable to see. The offender has been remanded till the old man is able to give evidence.—[O. S. Times.

Last Sunday night some persons entered Mr. Ainly's collar by way of an outside window and carried off two pans of cakes, a pie and a pail of milk, the parties were tracked the next morning up the railroad track when they found the pans.—[Mt. Forest Confederate.

Mr. Daniel McArthur and Miss Martha Fawcett, daughter of Mr. Jno. Fawcett of this Township, were married in Meaford on Tuesday last by the Rev. A, T. Colter.—[Thornbury Standard.

THE ADVANCE extends its hearty congratulations and well-wishes to the young couple.

Mr. John Smyth, hotel-keeper at Ravenna, met with a painful accident at a raising at Thomas Carefoot's last week, whereby his left hand was shockingly lacerated by an iron hook at the end of a chain which accidentally got caught in the fleshy part of the hand.—[Thornbury Standard.

A Beeton man with a garden knows something about planting corn. Two weeks ago, when he had finished dropping a row, he turned around to find two of his neighbor's hens watching him. They had picked up all the grains he put in the hills, and were waiting for more.—[Beeton World.

Last Sunday evening as Mrs. and Miss Hogarth, of Shelburne, were returning from a drive, in turning up the lane at their house one of the front wheels of the buggy struck a post, breaking the wheel into pieces and throwing the occupants out with considerable force. Beyond the danger done to the buggy and sundry bruises there is nothing serious to record. —[Shelburne Economist

SNAKE STORY.—Snake stories are generally false but this is a true one. Mrs. John Tiping, of Honeywood, was badly frightened one morning last week. She went into the bedroom to make up the bed that had been occupied by the children, and on turning over one of the pillows she discovered a large sized snake coiled up taking things comfortable. The snake had probably been there all night.—[Shelburne Free Press.

On Saturday night some person or persons broke into Mr. G. R. Gilroy's branch store at Yeovil, and helped themselves to some seven or eight dollars worth of goods. They made an entrance through a window in the back shop and then bored holes through the door till there was room for a hand and arm to go in and pull back the bolt. They burst off the alarm till but only got a few cents in change. It is generally supposed here that the thieves reside in the neighborhood.—[Mt. Forest Representative.

Mrs. James Allen, living near Dornoch, aged about 60, was drowned in a well on the farm last Tuesday. It was a cribbed well in which there were shelves for milk, and as Mrs. Allen was lowering a dish she is supposed to have overbalanced and gone down head first. The well was about twelve feet deep and had some four feet of water in it. The accident happened between twelve and two o'clock in the day. Her husband didn't feel well and lay down awhile to rest, and on rising missed his wife. After a short search he found her as described. The neighbors were alarmed and the body was taken up.—(Chatsworth cor. O. S. Advertiser.

Telling what goeth on in and around Flesherton.

Bargains are the order of the day at Climo & Co's, Flesherton.

Prices are marked away down, down, down, at McCabe's store, Priceville.

Somebody stabbed a horse belonging to Constable Finbow, of Laurel (Dufferin Co.) a couple of weeks ago.

Mr. Boyd Thompson has purchased a house and lot near the Baptist chapel, Flesherton, from Squire Armstrong, and will take up his abode in our midst. A hearty welcome, friend Thompson.

Russell's noted jewelry store has been removed to the new premises on Toronto street—opposite Climo & Co's store—where business will be attended to in the usual excellent manner. The new store has been thoroughly refitted throughout.

Mrs. Caswell, of Markdale, will prepare a grand dinner at her hotel for visitors to that village on the 12th of July. Orangemen and others are invited to get their dinner there. Mrs. Caswell enjoys a wide and well deserved reputation for the substantial excellence of her dinners.

A very large black bear was shot on Lot 26, 5th line Mono, Wednesday of last week, by John Brinkman. The dead animal was taken to Orangeville and sold to Mr. Bennett, who in turn shipped the carcase to Mr. Fee, of St. Lawrence Market, Toronto. The meat becoming tainted it was sold to a fat rendering establishment, but the skin alone sold for $15. Bruin killed quite a large number of sheep for the farmers of Mono before being captured.—[Shelburne Economist.

Attention, Stockmen!

The attention of wide-awake stockmen is directed to the advertisement in another column anent the thorough-bred Durham Bull, "Gray Champion." This is a fine animal, and all farmers desirous of improving their stock should not fail to see him.

September 24th and 25th.

The Fall Exhibition of East Grey Agricultural Society will be held on the grounds, Flesherton, on Monday and Tuesday, September 24th and 25th. The Prize List is undergoing a revision and will be in the hands of the printer this week. The list of Special Attractions will be published on the large posters this year instead of in the prize list pamphlets as formerly.

Anniversary Sermons.

The Session of Chalmer's church here has been fortunate in securing the services of the Rev. W. A. Hunter, M. A., of Orangeville, to preach the anniversary sermons in the Presbyterian church here Sabbath next at 11 a. m. and 6.30 p. m. Rev. Mr. Hunter has been called to the pastorate of Erskine church, Toronto, a position recently occupied by the late lamented Rev. John Smith.

A Pleasant Garden Party.

The garden party held on the grounds of Squire Armstrong last Monday evening was a decided success. The arrangements in connection therewith were most complete—notwithstanding the failure of the brass band to connect. From beginning to end everything passed off smoothly and pleasantly. The presence of so distinguished a guest as Prof. Torrington, of Toronto—probably the greatest musical genius in Canada—imparted a decided tone to the proceedings. An impromptu musical program, in which—with his usual charming good nature—Prof. Torrington accompanied several vocalists on the piano, was thoroughly enjoyed by the many lovers of good music present.

No medicine is more conscientiously prepared, more powerful, or more highly concentrated, than Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Its standard of excellence is the result of careful study. This preparation is acknowledged by the medical profession to be the best blood purifier.

Personal Pointers.

Squire M. Richardson will shortly visit his native land, England.

Mrs. J. D. Clarke and her two sons, of Hamilton, are the guests of Squire Armstrong.

Miss Wilmot, of Milton, is the guest of Mrs. J. W. Shilton at the Methodist parsonage.

Mr. Barber, of Toronto, called on ye Editor Saturday last, on his way to Maxwell, at which place he was the guest of Dr. Kerr during his stay.

Mr. E. Vanzant, leader of our brass band, Mr. E. Chaussie, and Mr. J. Parks accompanied the Clarksburg band on an excursion trip to Midland City on Monday last.

Mrs. J. W. Henderson, Miss Franke Henderson, and other members of the family, of Toronto, have taken up their abode in their cottage on Toronto street for the summer.

Professor Torrington, the celebrated Toronto musician, was the guest of Squire Armstrong Monday and Tuesday. The Prof. is an expert angler and went out fishing both days.

Mr. Aikenhead, of the well-known Toronto firm of Aikenhead & Crombie, his daughter, Miss Jennie Aikenhead, and his sons, Messrs. Thos., James, and John Aikenhead, respectively, are the guests of Squire Armstrong.

Rev. J. W. Shilton, B. A., left for Montreal on Monday morning to attend the great Temperance Convention which is being held there this week. He goes there as the representative of Fountain Council, R. T. of T.

Mr. Wm. Irwin, Principal of Flesherton Public Schools, will conduct the Entrance Examinations at Durham this week. Mr. Irwin is eminently qualified for the position, and we are pleased to notice the fitting tribute paid to his abilities as an educationist.

Royal Templars.

At the usual weekly meeting of the Royal Templars held on Tuesday evening, the 26th ult., there was a large attendance of members. The chief item on the program was the presentation of an address to Bro. J. Gordon, accompanied with a purse of money. The address, which was composed and read by Bro. Shilton, expressed in fitting terms the loss the members of the Council felt they were sustaining in the departure of Bro. Gordon from amongst them. Bro. Gordon feelingly replied. He thanked the members for the kind words spoken and for the tangible proof of their esteem of which he had just been the recipient. The musical part of the programme was well sustained by Miss M. E. and Sarah Smith, Bros. G. Smith, Wm. Dinwoodie, Barnhouse & Russell, Sister Damude presiding at the organ. Altogether a very pleasant evening was spent.—Com.

"Highland Boy."

This is the name of a very handsome Hambletonian stallion owned by Mr. Alex. Hannah. His marvellous success this season is ample evidence of the fact that Mr. Hannah's enterprise in introducing such noble animals is thoroughly appreciated by stock-raisers. Mr. Hannah is an experienced judge of horse-flesh, and any animal handled by him is bound to become noted far and near for general excellence. Wide awake stock-raisers are advised to see "Highland Boy" by all means. "Highland Boy" was at the Irish Lake Picnic last Thursday, and, it is needless to say, was much admired by all who saw him. For particulars in reference to route, pedigree, &c., see bills.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

S. T. Election of Officers.

The following are the officers of Flesherton Division, Sons of Temperance, for the current quarter:—

Dr. Christoe, W. P.
Miss E. Brown, W. A.
Mr. Walter Leitch, Recording Scribe.
Miss Maria Beecroft, Asst. Rec. Scribe.
Miss Bell Christoe, Treasurer.
Mr. W. Latimer, F. S.
Mr. Nelson Kester, Conductor.
Miss Katie Bellamy, Asst. Con.
Mr. Claudius Ekins, Chaplain.
Mr. John W. Field, Sentinel.
Mr. J. E. Moore, P. W. P.
Mr. A. R. Fawcett, D. G. W. P.

Representatives to Grand Lodge and National Division in Toronto:—Dr. Christoe, Rev. T. Watson, and Messrs. J. E. Moore, William Irwin, C. J. Sproule, Squire Armstrong, and A. R. Fawcett.

No injurious effects can follow the use of Ayer's Ague Cure. It contains an unfailing antidote and specific for miasmatic poisons, together with remedial agents which purify and re-invigorate the system.

Muddy Valley.

From our own Correspondent.

Mr. Transon, the blind music teacher, has succeeded in organizing a singing class in the schoolhouse near Booth's corners, also in the Presbyterian church at Swinton Park. He will have quite a purse when he goes home to see his better half about harvest time, as he has about forty pupils in each class, and he teaches five nights each week.

Raisings are very numerous now-a-days -W. McMurdo had one last Tuesday and G. Martin had one the day after. Geordie Right got his foot badly hurt at the former's and there was some beautiful swearing done. Martin's building went up nicely and there was nobody hurt. There was a football match afterwards between the Swinton Clippers and Hopeville team.

The masons are rushing work at J. T. Wilson's.

Mr. Dougal Ferguson erected a nice frame building around his well. He bought a new pump and undoubtedly he wishes to protect it from the hot sun. A very good idea, Dougal.

Mr. Porter, who participated in the field fight that occurred near here and came off second best, resolved to have revenge, so he entered an action against T. Ferris, who gave him the licking. But, after going all the way to Owen Sound and finding things did not work just as he expected, the matter was settled out of court.

Mr. John McDonell and wife seem to enjoy themselves very well in this part, as they take frequent drives to Owen Sound and other parts. They will shortly return to their home in Kansas.

Mr. Adam Watson got his thumb and finger cut off while engaged sawing shingles last Thursday.

Sam Gardener is working at the foundation under D. Ferguson's barn. Although he is Gardener by name he is no by trade, as he is a great deal better with a sledge and trowel than with either a pruning hook or hoe.

A few of the young folks around here assembled at a certain place in Muddy Valley recently to spend the evening and amuse themselves as best they could. There were not many of the fair sex present, and when they took their departure there was a great rush among the gents to catch on. One poor fellow got left and he took a straight line for home and ran foul of a mud hole. We do not think it was an attempt at suicide as he offered no resistance while being helped out.

A Union of Music and Art.

A musical toad had her home in a hole,
Croak! Croak! Croak!
Beneath a gray rock on a little green knoll,
Croak! Croak! Croak!
As mildly malicious as toad nature may be,
The neighbors all cried, "what an amiable lady!"
The beetle, the snail and the esthetic mole,
Croak! Croak! Croak!

The esthetic mole made a tragical stride,
Croak! Croak! Croak!
"Like the poets of old I am sightless," he cried,
Croak! Croak! Croak!
"I've a beautiful soul and a mind analytic;
These glasses, I'm told, are becoming a critic,"
And he mounted his goggles with infinite pride,
Croak! Croak! Croak!

Sang the musical toad in a low minor key,
Croak! Croak! Croak!
On some sweet summer marsh he is dreaming of me!"
Croak! Croak! Croak!
"O love!" cried the mole, all his soul in a quiver,
"I've an underground castle not far from the river;
O say, dearest, say, that our wedding shall be!"
Croak! Croak! Croak!

Said the musical toad with a coquettish start,
Croak! Croak! Croak!
"Shall I give you my hand when you've stolen my heart?"
Croak! Croak! Croak!
The wedding created a social sensation;
The beetle and all of the knoll population
Were bid to the union of Music and Art—
Croak! Croak! Croak!

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

"Why are you shaking your head?" Madge asked, imperatively. "There's not the least use in trying to resist me. You're not strong enough for anything—you must rest for ten days or a fortnight. I have taken possession of you to pet and to nurse; when you are quite yourself you shall hear our plans for you."

"Have you made plans for me?" Shirley said, smiling down sadly at the sweet, bright face. "That is very good of you. May I hear them.

Madge hesitated a little; the plans which she had talked over so eagerly with her mother on the previous evening seemed difficult to unfold to this grave, stately woman, stately even in her shabby black dress, as she sat on the window-seat, resting her head against the wall.

"Won't you tell me?" Shirley said, softly. "Whatever they are, I shall be only too grateful for the kind thought which prompted them."

"And you will not be offended?"

"Offended—with you, my child?"

Shirley smiled slightly as she spoke, and, lifting her hand, parted Madge's hair on her brow with tender caressing fingers; then, bending forward, she put her lips to the pure white forehead.

At the touch Madge Oliphant's face colored, and she trembled slightly. She had taken a sudden, warm, girlish fancy to this beautiful fascinating woman who had come so strangely into her life.

"Mamma thought, and I hoped, that you would come and live with us as my friend and companion," said Madge, looking up with entreating eyes.

"But—you know nothing of me," returned Shirley, unsteadily. "I can give you no references as to——"

"Mamma said she would trust you," Madge said eagerly, coloring hotly at the remembrance of the earnest entreaties she had employed to induce Lady Oliphant to dispense with references in case this beautiful and interesting stranger had none.

"She said she would trust me!" Shirley echoed, with a bright light of admiration on her face as she thought of these strangers' faith in her. "How good of her! Heaven bless her for it!"

"And you will come? Oh, please come!" pleaded Madge. "We shall have such pleasant times, you and I together. Mamma is not very strong, you know, and you would help me to take care of her, and we should be so happy! You will come?"

Shirley hesitated; then, looking down at the eager entreating face, she shook her head. She knew she could take no position, however humble, in such a household as Sir Frederic Oliphant's; there would always be constant risk of detection. Even if they had not known Guy they might have other visitors who would recognize her; even among the servants there might be some one.

"You will not come?" Madge said, in a disappointed tone. "But surely——"

"Do not urge me," Shirley begged, faintly. "I cannot bear to refuse you; but indeed I must do so. I must not come into your home, my child. Believe me, it hurts me greatly to refuse you."

"Then I will not urge you. Will you let me tell you the other plan? I think perhaps you will like it better. You will not be offended, will you?" added Madge, shyly.

"Nothing you could do or say would offend me," Shirley assured her. "My child, but for your kindness, I should be homeless and shelterless now—but for your charity I should have starved to death by the roadside. Oh, there is no work I will not do to earn my bread, since," she added, with irrepressible bitterness—"since I cannot die."

She dropped her head upon her hands as she spoke, and covered her face, and there was a short pause in the little attic room where they were; then Shirley looked up again, and said softly—

"What is it, Miss Oliphant? Tell me what you have found for me. Ah, forgive me—I have pained you! But indeed I will not distress you again."

"I am so sorry for you!" Madge said, pitifully. "You are so young and so pretty to be unhappy. Shall I tell you what we were thinking of, mamma and I? We want a teacher for the village schools, and we thought you might be that teacher."

Shirley's face brightened.

"The schools here?"

"Yes. That red-brick building on the hill is the girls' school, and that little cottage beside it is where the teacher lives. Do you think you would like that? Mamma told me to tell you," the girl went on, coloring a little, "that the—the salary would be quite sufficient, and that the cottage was a comfortable little place. The last teacher was a lady," continued Madge, earnestly. "We were very fond of her, and she left us only to be married to a gentleman who had been a curate here, but who is now the Vicar of Addinbroke. The work is not very hard." Madge resumed in a minute. "There are two pupil teachers, and you would soon get into the ways here. You know, mamma has a hobby, and her hobby is the education of the children, and she likes them to be taught useful things, plain sewing and all that."

Shirley's thoughts went back to the sewing classes that she had attended at the convent at Bruges; she could teach plain sewing, great lady as she had been; her proficiency in needle-work had often astonished her maid.

"It would be a quiet home for you," Miss Oliphant continued in her earnestness. "I think you would not be unhappy, and we would try to make you comfortable. Will you stay with us there, at the cottage?"

"I can not," Shirley answered piteously and brokenly; and Madge uttered a quick exclamation of disappointment as she rose from her knees by Shirley's side and turned away keenly hurt.

With a sorrowful tenderness and regret and yearning Shirley's eyes followed her as she moved away. Ah, what a haven of rest and peace the little red-brick cottage seemed to her! And yet she had to turn away from it. How could she accept a post which might bring her into contact with Guy? For, of course, if he was "courting" Miss Oliphant, he would be constantly at Erindale, and they could not fail to meet at some time or other. No; she must refuse it; she must go away, and let him be happy with this sweet young girl who was so eminently worthy of his love, who would make him forget the past and his misery. She must go away and let Madge think of her as ungrateful for all her kindness. She must go away—but whither—whither could she go?

With a great tearless sob her head sunk forward on her breast. Ah, how hard it all was, how cruel life was to her? Was she never to find rest? Must she go out once more into the cold, cruel world which had treated her so hardly? Must she face the long nights without shelter again? Must she know the misery and suffering of hunger and thirst and fatigue and depression? Must she go through them all once more? Ah, Heaven, why did they save her—why did they not let her die?"

Madge came back slowly, and stood beside her for a moment in silence.

"Won't you stay?" she said, gently. "We will try to make you happy."

"Heaven help me!" Shirley answered, brokenly. "I cannot! "Ah, don't let me trouble you, Miss Oliphant! I bring misery and suffering wherever I go, and you must not let the thought of me cloud your young life. Ah, if it is as bright and cloudless as I wish and hope it may be, it will be a happy life!"

"But why will you not stay?" the young girl persisted, gently. "I think you would not be unhappy; and mamma would be so pleased, and I—"

Shirley caught the gentle hands which were held out so kindly toward her, and drew them both close to her heart.

"Heaven bless you for all your goodness!" she said, tearfully. "I shall never forget it—never. But I cannot stay—do not ask me—for your own sake, do not ask me!"

The intensity of her earnestness struck Madge Oliphant painfully, and she forbore from her entreaty, wondering a great deal and grieving for the misery on Shirley's face, which seemed to deepen every moment.

"I will not urge you any longer," she said, gently. "Perhaps you will think it over for a day or two, and give mamma an answer. It will make us very happy if you accept. And now I must not talk any longer," she added, "for I have tired you out. Will you come down with me?"

Shirley rose at once; above all things, she feared to excite suspicion in the young girl's mind, and, moreover, it was a very great pleasure to her to be with Madge—the girl was so sweet and bright, so sparkling and tender; besides, she wanted to know her better, this happy girl, this happy fortunate girl who was to live with Guy in the future and bask in the sunshine of his love and nestle into his heart, healing the old wound and making him happy once more. Sweet blue-eyed Madge—heaven bless her and him!

Mrs. Ford was waiting for them in the little sitting-room, and Madge tried to chat with her usual gayety; but it was difficult for her to overcome her disappointment, and Shirley's sad eyes became sadder still as she watched the shadow which darkened the fair young face.

"You don't seem so bright to-night, Miss Madge," Mrs. Ford said, looking at her anxiously. "Are you quite well?"

"Oh, yes, nurse, I am quite well! But things will go wrong sometimes you know!"

"What is going wrong with you, Miss Madge dear? You were born to live in the sunshine."

"Ah, but it is not always sunshine for any of us!" Madge said, sighing. "I suppose we have to put up with clouds sometimes. It is all sunshine which makes the desert, nursie."

"Lor, is it now?" said Mrs. Ford, in amazement. "Well, I should like a little more sunshine, Miss Madge. But what has vexed you lately, my dear?"

"Two or three things, nurse. One is that Major Stuart is going away to-morrow morning."

Shirley started and glanced up quickly. The girl's face was full of the most unfeigned regret! but she spoke without a shade of embarrassment or constraint.

"Going away, Miss Madge—so soon?" exclaimed Mrs. Ford.

"Yes—going abroad for six months—for the whole winter. You know he was very ill last winter, nursie; and the doctors say now he must not risk spending this winter at home."

"But he does not look ill, Miss Madge," said Mrs. Ford consolingly, for the girl's eyes were full of tears.

"Not very ill; but papa says he is dreadfully altered, and I think so too. But I hope this winter abroad will do him good."

"And he will come back with the spring, Miss Madge, my dear?" said Mrs. Ford.

"Yes, with the spring," echoed Madge sorrowfully. "Do you find the air too cold, Mrs. Grant? I am sure you shivered."

"Oh, no—oh, no!" Shirley said nervously, as she shrunk back from the window, thankful for the semi-darkness in the little room which prevented her changing color and trembling hands from being noticed.

"And Major Stuart leaves to-morrow, Miss Madge?" said Mrs. Ford, harking back to the subject which interested her most.

"Yes, by the early express; so you must say good-bye to him, nursie, when he comes presently to fetch me. He will be here very soon now, I should think. Mamma was tired," she added, turning toward Shirley as she sat in her corner, "or she would have come in to see you, Mrs. Grant."

Mrs. Ford hurried away to get her lamp ready for lighting; and, as soon as they were alone, Shirley said hastily and tremulously—

"Miss Oliphant, will you allow me to change my mind? If I can perform the duties Lady Oliphant requires from me, I will stay."

"Oh, you dear, good girl!" Madge cried delightedly. "I am so glad! Perform the duties? Of course you can. I'll coach you up. Oh, you have made me so glad!"

"I am afraid there is not much cause for gladness," remarked Shirley; but before Madge could answer, a firm, rather heavy step sounded on the graveled path without, and Guy Stuart's well remembered tones fell upon Shirley's ear.

He was standing outside, and spoke through the open window.

"Madge, are you there, dear?" he said; and Shirley shrunk back, trembling and powerless to move in her terror and agitation.

"Yes, I am here," Madge answered. "I am coming. I won't keep you, Guy; but nursie wants to say good-bye to you."

"Does she? We must not linger, Madge. Your mother is anxious about you, and I have brought you a shawl."

"A shawl on this lovely night. I really do not need it. Nursie," she added, "here is Major Stuart. Come and speak to him. Take care of your tall head, Guy.

Major Stuart entered, stooping a little as he passed under the doorway. Mrs. Ford came in hastily from the kitchen, but without a lamp, for she had not had time to light it. Oh, how thankful Shirley felt! And yet it seemed as if the terror and anxiety of that moment must kill her.

"I am sorry to hear you are going away, sir," said Mrs. Ford, courtesying to the tall figure which stood on the threshold of her little sitting-room.

"Thank you," Guy's grave deep voice said. "I am sorry to go; but it can't be helped, you know. I hope to find you looking as well when I see you again in the spring," he added, shaking hands with her cordially. "I must take Miss Oliphant away now. It is getting late. Here is your shawl, Madgie."

He placed it round her carefully, the white fleecy shawl which made such a pretty frame to the bright piquant face. Mrs. Ford had lighted a candle, but its rays did not penetrate to Shirley's corner, although they lighted up Guy's dark grave face and Madgie's sparkling eyes and golden hair with its soft covering.

"Good-night," Madgie said, going toward Shirley and taking her hand kindly. "How cold you are, Mrs. Grant! You have stayed up too long. Take care of her, nursie."

"Trust me, Miss Madgie," said Mrs. Ford, smiling. "She'll do nicely now."

"I hope so. Good night, nursie. Come, Guy."

She slipped her hand within his arm, with a gesture which had been very common with Shirley herself during the time of her engagement to Guy, and they went out together, Mrs. Ford going to the door to watch them walk down the drive, while Shirley put her hands to her eyes to shut out, if she could, the sight of the grave changed face. Ah, when she saw it again, what wonderful things had come to pass?

"They make a fine couple," Mrs. Ford said complacently, coming back into the room. "Don't you think so, Mrs. Grant? He is too old for her, I fancy; but I dare say he will make her very happy."

CHAPTER XLI.

Major Stuart left Erindale the next morning, never dreaming that the woman whom he had caught a glimpse of in the little, dimly lighted room was the woman whom he had loved and lost and sorrowed for with such an intense sorrow. Just the trivial circumstance that Mrs. Ford's lamp had been a little refractory had saved Shirley from detection, for she had been too startled and unnerved to attempt flight, even if she had had the opportunity of escape.

So Guy went away, taking with him that heavy heartache which was always present with him now, and which would cease, he thought sometimes, only when life's troubles were over altogether for him; and Shirley Glynn, or Mrs. Grant, as she was called in the village, became the village school-mistress, and took up her residence in the little, red-brick cottage built beside the school-house—a quaint, comfortable little dwelling, with a wide, low-ceiled sitting-room, and a little kitchen and a bedroom at one side, and above two little attic bedrooms, one of which was devoted to lumber, while in the other slept the teacher's youthful handmaiden, a trim little damsel of fifteen.

It was a humble home truly, but to Shirley it seemed a haven of rest. After the stuffy London lodgings, her sitting-room, with its polished woodwork and bright windows, and cleanly, comfortable, old-fashioned furniture, was very pleasant, while Madge herself had superintended all the arrangements for the comfort of the new teacher, for whom she had conceived so deep a love. A little cottage piano—Madge's own property—had been sent down from the Hall, and a little bookcase with some volumes of the girl's own selection—Dickens and Thackeray chiefly filling the shelves.

Shirley's duties were not very onerous. The children were well taught and well drilled, and after a time her duties became sufficiently familiar not to be very wearying. Certainly they were irksome at times—and such duties can hardly fail to be so; but as she grew stronger she felt it less, and the disinclination to exertion ceased.

Her life, although necessarily monotonous, was not a lonely one. Almost daily Madge Oliphant paid her a visit at the cottage. Sometimes the girl was walking alone, her only attendant being a great black retriever called Rover, a present from Guy Stuart; at others she was riding, and she would leave her horse with the groom and come in smiling and radiant, looking so bright and pretty in her close-fitting habit and coquettish riding-hat that Shirley always felt a pang of regret at the thought that Guy was not there to see her.

Sometimes too she would walk down in the afternoon and have tea with Shirley in the low-ceiled sitting-room which looked so pleasant and homelike when it was lighted by lamp and fire; for the winter began early that year. October was a cold month, and at the first of November there was snow, which made Madge's visits not quite so frequent, although she still came as often as possible, for her enthusiastic admiration of Shirley had settled down into deep, steadfast affection, as sincere as any Shirley had ever received.

And it proved the depth and unselfishness of Shirley's love for Guy Stuart that she loved this young girl with a warm and true affection, which was all the deeper because she thought her Guy's chosen wife. There was a sad, sweet pleasure for Shirley in her study of Madge Oliphant's character, in her little timid attempts to teach her something that she fancied it would please Guy for her to know. She coaxed Madge into taking some music-lessons from her, and into practicing at home. The young girl was but an indifferent performer; and Shirley knew what a lover of music Major Stuart was; and Madge's steady progress under her tuition pleased her greatly. Few as the years between them were—the one was eighteen, the other five-and-twenty—Shirley's seniority gave her an excuse for petting and scolding and remonstrating with Madge in a pretty and motherly way which the girl enjoyed and laughed at, but which had its effect nevertheless. Not that there was much to alter or improve in sweet, blue-eyed Madge Oliphant; for Shirley owned to herself frankly and sincerely that Guy could not have made a wiser choice. She was just the bright, sweet girl who would steal into his heart and nestle there and make him happy, and help him to forget all the past bitterness and sorrow. And, when such thoughts as these crossed his mind, Shirley would thank Heaven that strength had been given her to go away, to resist Guy's entreaties, and to leave him free. With her, deeply as he had loved her, and passionately as she had returned that love, he would never have been able to forget the past; and Madge had no connection with it; it was not she who had made him suffer such an agony of pain and misery, and she would brighten his life, as she—Shirley—could never have done.

It became one of the school-mistress' greatest pleasures in the long lonely winter evenings, when she sat alone in the little sitting-room, too weary after the day's work to employ herself or to do anything but lie back in the comfortably cushioned American chair which Madge's care had provided for her, to picture Guy's future with Madge.

Her love was great enough and intense enough to be perfectly unselfish; there was no touch of jealousy in her heart against Madge; she did not envy her the love she had won or the position she was to fill. Perhaps she envied her a little the power to make Guy happy; but she wished that happiness with too sincere a wish to mind the means by which it was procured. And such a wife as Madge would make him happy; there was no doubt of that.

They would be as happy a couple as Ruby and Oswald, she thought sometimes—as happy as only a married couple who had perfect love for and faith in each other can be. She recollected sometimes that, once or twice after she had known Lucie Grey, she had wished that Guy might be made happy with such a wife; but Madge would suit him better; her brightness would relieve the gravity of his character and give him back the youth which had been so cruely marred.

Sometimes she wondered a little why Madge, who was so frank and candid, and who showed such perfect confidence in her, should never mention Guy: but she never did; and Shirley dared not pronounce his name. She felt that even now she could not speak it without betraying herself, and, if she showed the slightest emotion, Madge might have her suspicions aroused, and she might be discovered. And then she would think wearily of the time when she would have to leave the little home and go out on her wanderings again. In the spring, when Guy came back, she must go away and hide herself once more, and find a new home. Perhaps, when Guy was married, and happily settled with his young wife, she might write to Oswald and Ruby and the Greys; they would not betray her to him then; and perhaps Ruby would take her in, and let her look after little Bertie and the baby-girl who had fluttered down into Oswald's home-nest the autumn before.

How she thought of them all during those long lonely vigils, of all her dear ones, whom she might never see again! Had they forgotten her? she wondered. Did they think of her sometimes, and feel a little sorry for her? Perhaps they thought her dead; and the fact that she had never applied for the annuity which Sir Hugh had left her would have given strong grounds for such a belief. What would they have said, she wondered sometimes, if they had known that she had been in want, that she had been without shelter for days, that she had almost died of starvation?

She was growing stronger now, although Madge Oliphant often felt dissatisfied about her health. Perhaps she would never be really strong again; but she was much better, and she was looking almost like the Shirley of old, in the black dress she always wore, and the white mob-cap, with its large black Alsatian bow, which Lady Oliphant liked the school-mistress to wear.

And the autumn passed, and the winter followed, and Christmas came—a regular old fashioned Christmas, people called it, with a hard frost and snow upon the ground and a blue sky and sunshine overhead. And Christmas was to be greeted warmly at Erindale. The church was to be decorated and joyful anthems were to be sung; and in the Hall at the Rectory, at Mrs. Ford's lodge, and in every cottage there were to be feasting and merry making—everywhere, save in that little red-brick cottage where the school-teacher lived, and where she was to spend the Christmas-tide alone, for even her little handmaiden had gone home.

It was Shirley's own wish that she should spend it in her little cottage home—the home which had grown dear to her from its rest and peace; for there were many who would have welcomed the school-mistress' fair face at their tables but Shirley had declined every invitation. She preferred to spend Christmas alone, she said gently, but decidedly; and they forbore to press her, for the sweet sad mouth could be firm at times, and she was evidently sincere in her desire.

* * * * *

On Christmas-day the snow fell heavily covering the hills and the valley with a soft, white, spotless mantle, so that many who came from a distance were deterred from attending Divine service, for the snow had drifted in places, and made the crossing of fields and by-paths rather a dangerous undertaking. Still the pretty decorated church was well filled, and there was no brighter, fairer face among the worshippers than Madge Oliphant's, as she sat in the Hall pew in her soft furs and velvet dress, against which the white skin and golden hair shone so delicately fair.

Shirley, from her place in the side-aisle, let her sad eyes rest upon her with a wistful pleasure. She was very lovely, this young girl who was to teach Guy to forget her, very lovely and bright and good; she would make him happy—thank Heaven for that; and she bowed her head upon her hand and tried to forget the one happy Christmas-tide she had spent in England, that immediately following her engagement to Guy, which this season brought so clearly and freshly to her mind. Well, it was something to have had even those few days of happiness to look back upon; some poor women had not even those. She had known the pleasure of requited love for a season; some women went from the cradle to the grave without feeling its sweetness, without possessing its joy.

Madge stopped her, when coming out of church, to whisper a warm wish of happiness and welfare, and Shirley answered it mutely, but with an expression in her eyes which more than satisfied Madge; and then, escaping from the parents of her pupils, who offered her no less sincere good wishes, Shirley climbed the hill on the top of which stood her cottage—a rather solitary home certainly, for there were no houses near the school-house and the cottage adjoining. It was a little lonely, Shirley thought, as she entered, closing the door carefully after her and fastening it, for though tramps and marauders were few and far between, she was not very courageous, and she felt safer with the door secured. A little terrier—a present from Madge, and a great favorite of Shirley's—greeted her with joyful and shrill barking, and prevented the loneliness and solitude from being too oppressive, and the fire was burning cheerily, as if it meant to do its best to make Shirley's solitary Christmas-day a little brighter, while the school-children had put up some holly and mistletoe upon the walls—and Shirley smiled sadly at the homely attempts at decoration.

Fresh From Vanity Fair.

Pink is the favored color for evening wear.

Black jet with colors appears in both costumes and millinery.

Showy tennis gowns are of white serge, braided with gilt or silver.

Dainty tea gowns are made of Henrietta in light shades, with surah fronts.

A dainty matinee was of esprit net, with perpendicular trucks enclosing ribbon.

White cloth jackets braided with metallic cords are in high favor for dressy wear.

The open-mesh point d'esprit net is more fashionable just now for a bride's veil than illusion.

Gilt, silver, steel, white or red braids are used to trim boating dresses, usually in graduated widths.

In many of the latest imported costumes there is a tendency to combine several shades of one color.

A single spray of flowers is seen upon some of the newest lace parasols, as if blown there by the wind.

A novel color combination is reseda with terra cotta, and both these colors are combined with black.

Gold, silver and other fancy embroideries are used to trim summer costumes of pongee and cashmerette.

Poppy-red, ecru, old-rose, reseda and goblin-blue are popular colors for the foundation of a dressy black lace toilete.

Green-grass hats have had a curious and humorous boom. The desire to wear something unique and exclusive to herself is strong in the circle of fashionable women, who are conspicuous and independent enough to make their own styles in a measure.

There is an attempt to introduce the outlandish Tosca, or Directoire, parasol handles. These consist of very long crooks, and are intended to be walked with, after the manner of the ladies of Louis XVI.'s court with their canes.

Although there are no decided deviations in the main lines upon which fashion is moving, there is an endless series of innovations in minor characteristics. Taking the single item of corsage, the styles are legion. Very often they are most effectively made of fragments put together with such picturesque effect that they outvie many a richer style made of a single material. When two or three fabrics combine to form a single corsage, the lining of the waistcoat is cut to begin with. This buttons snugly up the back, and upon the front of this is mounted, for instance, a plain velvet piece that points like a girdle in the immediate front. At each side of this piece are set silk-lined revers, or lapels of material of which the corsage is composed. Next to these come two more revers of plain silk or velvet again. All these revers narrow to an inch and a half as they reach the neck.

Discovery of Ancient Altars.

There have recently been discovered in the high Alps, near the summit of the Great St. Bernard, five large granite altars and a number of other relics of the stone age, such as axes, knives, etc., used in the pagan epochs for sacrifices. Swiss writers emphasize the historical importance of this discovery, in that it is a proof that St. Bernard was a place of sacrifice in pagan times, and also as far back as the age of stone the Canton Valais was inhabited by human beings.

Makes a Difference.

"This is the fourth time I've called you, William," said his wife. "You told me that you wanted to get up in good season this morning." "Yes," replied William, sleepily, "but it was last night when I told you that."

Surprising Corroboration.

Amy: "I like Charlie; his kisses are so nice!" Belle (with enthusiasm): "Aren't they!"

The pa[illegible]s of the season are like small tents.

Gentleman Jim.

In the diamond shaft worked Gentleman Jim,
Handsome of face, stout of limb,
Coarse in dress, but something in him,
Whether down in the coal mine, solid and grim,
Or wandering alone in holiday time,
Won the love and respect of all in that clime.

He had no sweetheart, he had no wife,
Some mighty sorrow had dimmed his life—
His earnings, hardly won and small,
Were at the orphans' and widows' call—
Of those who had perished in shaft or winze,
He was the friend of all living things,
And moving along in those toilsome ways,
He wore the demeanor of gentler days.

In April last, when the mine fell in,
Beneath the timbers stood Gentleman Jim;
With giant grasp he flung two of the boys
Clear out of danger. With deafening noise
The shaft gave way on every side;
The boys were safe, but Jim—he died—
Died as men die, and will die again,
Giving their lives for their fellow-men.

When rocks and timbers were cleared away,
And Jim borne up to the light of day,
They took from his bosom, stained with blood,
Two withered leaves and a withered bud
Pinned on a card. "Toute-a-toi—Marie"
Was written beneath them; beneath it he,
On his heart for years had worn,
Had written, "All withered—except the thorn.'

What life romance, what story of wrong,
This man had locked up in his soul so long
None who loved him may ever know;
But the tale of his glorious, chivalric deed
Shall not perish as long as men hold this creed—
That the hero whose blood for his kind is shed
Wins a deathless fame and an honored bed—
A monument grander than sculptor e'er gave,
In the glory that hallows the martyr's grave.

Bricks of Blown Glass.

We have already mentioned, says a writer in La Construction Moderne, the many applications of glass for building purposes, as exhibited at the last exhibition of decorative arts. Thanks to the decrease in price of coal, and to the recent improvements in glass manufacture, the product is classed at the present time among the usual material the architect employs. It is well known that the process of glass making is by melting or blowing. Sheets of polished glass from 14 to 30 millimeters in thickness are chiefly used for casings of walls in dining-rooms, linings of bath-rooms, water-closets or recesses requiring frequent cleaning. They answer the same purpose as pottery tiles or enamelled bricks. Rough glass of greater thickness is employed as flagging for pavements for the purpose of forming a luminous flooring. It is then set by means of putty for cement in iron settings. Blown, in place of melted, glass can be advantageously used when lightness and transparency is preferred to strength, when, for instance, it is desired to use glass in vertical walls or ceilings with the object of lighting lower stories or basements. As applications of the kind have been rare, we are pleased when we have the opportunity of recording them. One of the latest instances of the employment of glass in this manner has been made by M. Falconnier, architect of Nyon, Switzerland, who has used glass in the form of hollow bricks. These bricks are cubes of 10 or 15 centimetres on the side, set in grooved iron casings. The joints in cement or plaster are retained in grooving hollow around the circumference of each piece, and held by putty. The metallic lattice work, very useful in a wall where strength is required, may be discarded where the object is strictly decorative. One of the principal qualities of these hollow brick is the isolation by the enclosed air which can be replaced by other matter less conductive of heat and sound. Besides, with the hollow glass various decorative effects can be obtained without the necessity of resorting to grinding or enamelling, as it is very easy to coat the inner faces with oil colors. M. Falconnier has also applied these hollow bricks at Lausanne, in attic decorations and in the construction of balusters and verandas.

How a Building Firm Succeeds.

A Nova Scotia building firm has recently informed a Halifax reporter that the secrets of their success are these: "They know their business, seek it, attend to it, from 6 o'clock in the morning until sundown guide and control it and don't let it drift. Neither do they waste time talking politics. They look after their workmen, know how much work a man should do in a day, see that he does it and pay him for doing it. A poor workman, in their experience, is dear at 50 cents a day. They find it good policy to procure the best men, get the most work out of them and pay the best wages. A man in their employ is paid what he is worth. Any man who does a fair day's work for the firm gets a fair day's pay. They don't believe in hiring men to kill time, nor do they calculate to employ men for more than one day who only work when the boss is around." The employer does a service to his men when he demands a full day's work. Good men gladly give it. By insisting upon such plain truths as are inculcated above, the tendency is to make lazy workmen into active ones, to lift careless or indifferent workmen into morals and manhood, to teach them to respect themselves and to earn higher wages. There is a "chunk" of sound business philosophy in these words of the firm, and they are suited for localities other than Nova Scotia.

In Dismal, Doleful Doubt.

When the shower came up yesterday a certain pedestrian whose jaw showed great determination took refuge in a doorway on Monroe avenue. He allowed numbers of pedestrians with umbrellas to pass him; but pretty soon the right sort of a man came along and he stepped boldly out, extended his arm and said: "Ah, you thief, but I have run you down at last! "Give me my property!" "Yes—ah—yes!" stammered the other, as he surrendered it. The man with the prominent jaw walked up the avenue as if nothing had happened, while the other skipped for the vacated doorway. "Was it his?" queried one who had witnesed the performance. "That's what worries me," replied the other; "I'm trying to think where I stole it from!"—Detroit Free Press.

It is stated that the Erie Railway Company will put up in all its stations signs reading: "Kissing on the platform strictly prohibited." This is a step in the right direction. Any such effort to make travel less hazardous should meet with the unqualified approval of the whole country. The large number of casualties lately has made many somewhat timid about getting on railroad cars, and it is cheering to see the Erie trying to allay these fears.—Albany Argus.

TIRED OF BEING A FUGITIVE.

Paterson's Defaulting Ex-City Clerk Returns After an Absence of Four Years.

"Will" Hague, who about this time in the year 1884 startled the city of Paterson, N. J., of which he was clerk at the time, by his disappearance, a defaulter to a considerable amount, astonished that place again yesterday by voluntarily returning and giving himself up to await trial for his offences. Only two or three men in the city knew that he was coming back, and he arrived on a train of the Susquehanna Railroad from New York, got off at a suburban station and was driven to the county jail.

On the night of July 3rd, 1884, some members of the Paterson Board of Aldermen discovered that Hague was a fugitive and probably a defaulter. He had not been seen around the City Hall for several days before, but this did not excite suspicion at first, as his work for the People's Brewing Company, of which he was Secretary, Treasurer and chief business man, as well as one of the stockholders, frequently took him away from his desk at the City Hall for considerable periods. It afterwards transpired that the other two members of the brewing company, Henry Schnatz and Joseph Hargreaves, found, as they alleged, that Hague had misappropriated funds of the concern to the extent of $12,000 to $15,000, and it was this revelation that led to Hague's flight. It was generally supposed that he used the city's money and sank it in the brewing company. The concern soon afterward was wound up.

An investigation showed that Hague's defalcation to the city was a little over $4,000; of which nearly $2,500 had been taken within a few weeks. The money stolen was that received for license fees, the City Clerk at that time holding also the office of register of licenses. The Board of Aldermen removed Hague, and the city offered a reward of $500 for his apprehension, to which Mayor Barnert added a personal offer of $250. Hague was a man of pleasing address and an able politician. He was one of the most popular men in the city, and had been re-elected to the office of City Clerk for several successive terms by the Board of Aldermen unanimously. He has a wife and family. It was at first supposed that he had gone to England, his native country, but he fled to Canada.

He lived for a while in London, Ont., and later settled in Toronto, where he became prosperous under the assumed name of Thomas Lees, organized an assurance association of which he was President, and did well in the real estate business with two of his brothers-in-law. His bondsmen were held for his defalcation, and in the Passaic County Courts a judgment for about $2,700 was given against them, Judge Dixon charging the jury that they could only be held for the amount Hague held in his hands as clerk on May 26th and what he received thereafter and did not pay in, because City Treasurer Ridgeway, imposed on by Hague, had allowed his good nature to interfere with his judgment and had credited Hague on the books with considerable sums previous to that time, for which he was really in default.—New York Tribune.

A Plucky Northwest Woman.

On the plains, in Assiniboine, I found a little lady in the larger of the only two stores in the place, who told me that the Indians on a reservation close by had begun to grow restless and were manifesting the fact by unusual insolence. Only the day before a dozen of the braves had come into the store, when she was stark alone in it, and had demanded whiskey, a commodity they were not allowed to touch and no one was permitted to sell. She told them she had none, and they sat, as Indians will, for a long time, as if to show her they would not go away until they got it. Curiously enough, no one came to the store from the settlement. By and bye the Indians proposed to search for the whiskey. She laughed at them and told them they could search. They did so, peeping and poking everywhere that they could think of. When they offered to go upstairs to her living apartments, she stood in the doorway and told them they must not venture there. She flattened her back against the door and defied them. She was less than the ordinary height, and did not weigh over 100 pounds, but she quailed them with the eye of a brave and determined woman, and when, presently, some white men came to make purchases the Indians took themselves off. Only a few nights before that this same woman had seen a wolf in her back yard, and had gone out and "shooed" it away with her apron and scolding, just as one of our girls might do to a cat. I never saw a man that I thought more plucky than she. Perhaps, though, what no Indian or wolf could do might be done by a mouse. But it is beyond all reason to expect the bravest not to fear a mouse.—Albany Fair Journal.

$500 Not Called For.

It seems strange that it is necessary to persuade men that you can cure their diseases by offering a premium to the man who fails to receive benefit. And yet Dr. Sage undoubtedly cured thousands of cases of obstinate catarrh with his "Catarrh Remedy," who would never have applied to him, if it had not been for his offer of the above sum for an incurable case. Who is the next bidder for cure or cash?

Long Rivers.

The length of the principal rivers in America are: Missouri to the Mississippi, 3,100 miles; Missouri to the Gulf, 4,350; Mississippi, 3,160; Amazon, 3,600; River de La Plata, 2,240; St. Lawrence, 2,100; Orinoco, 1,600; Rio Grande, 1,800. The Missouri (to the Gulf) is the longest river in the world. The Danube is the longest in Europe, the Yangtse-Kiang in Asia and the Senegal in Africa.

Safe, Sure and Painless.

What a world of meaning this statement embodies. Just what you are looking for, is it not? Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor—the great sure-pop corn cure—acts in this way. It makes no sore spots; safe, acts speedily and with certainty; sure and mildly, without inflaming the parts; painlessly. Do not be imposed upon by imitations or substitutes.

Innate Depravity of Animate Matter.

Can any one explain why a bottle of catsup, when it explodes on the table, will sprinkle everything in the room except the meat?—Chicago Tribune.

A PLEASANT

REMEDIAL HOME.

FULL STAFF OF

EXPERIENCED PHYSICIANS & SURGEONS.

Many CHRONIC DISEASES Successfully Treated without a Personal Consultation.

WE obtain our knowledge of the patient's disease by the application, to the practice of medicine, of well-established principles of modern science. The most ample resources for treating lingering or chronic diseases, and the greatest skill, are thus placed within the easy reach of invalids, however distant they may reside. Write and describe your symptoms, inclosing ten cents in stamps, and a complete treatise, on your particular disease, will be sent you, with our opinion as to its nature and curability.

OUR FIELD OF SUCCESS.

NASAL, THROAT AND LUNG DISEASES. The treatment of Diseases of the Air Passages and Lungs, such as Chronic Catarrh in the Head, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Asthma, and Consumption, both through correspondence and at our institutions, constitutes an important specialty.

We publish three separate books on Nasal, Throat and Lung Diseases, which give much valuable information, viz: (1) A Treatise on Consumption, Laryngitis and Bronchitis; price, post-paid, ten cents. (2) A Treatise on Asthma, Catarrh, Phthisis, giving new and successful treatment; price, post-paid, ten cents. (3) A Treatise on Chronic Catarrh in the Head; price, post-paid, two cents.

DISEASES OF DIGESTION. Dyspepsia, "Liver Complaint," Obstinate Constipation, Chronic Diarrhea, Tape-worms, and kindred affections, are among those chronic diseases in the successful treatment of which our specialists have attained great success. Our Complete Treatise on Diseases of the Digestive Organs will be sent to any address on receipt of ten cents in postage stamps.

KIDNEY DISEASES. BRIGHT'S DISEASE, DIABETES, and kindred maladies, have been very largely treated, and cures effected in thousands of cases which had been pronounced beyond hope. These diseases are readily diagnosticated, or determined, by chemical analysis of the urine, without a personal examination of patients, who can, therefore, generally be successfully treated at their homes. The study and practice of chemical analysis and microscopical examination of the urine in our consideration of cases, with reference to correct diagnosis, in which our institution long ago became famous, has naturally led to a very extensive practice in diseases of the urinary organs.

CAUTION. These diseases should be treated only by a specialist thoroughly familiar with them, and who is competent to ascertain the exact condition and stage of advancement which the disease has made (which can only be ascertained by a careful chemical and microscopical examination of the urine), for medicines which are curative in one stage or condition do positive injury in others.

Being in constant receipt of numerous inquiries for a complete work on the nature and curability of these maladies, written in a style to be easily understood, we have published a large, Illustrated Treatise on these diseases, which will be sent to any address on receipt of ten cents in postage stamps.

BLADDER DISEASES. INFLAMMATION OF THE BLADDER, STONE IN THE BLADDER, Gravel, Enlarged Prostate Gland, Retention of Urine, and kindred affections, may be included among those in the cure of which our specialists have achieved extraordinary success. These are fully treated of in our Illustrated Pamphlet on Urinary Diseases. Sent by mail for 10 cts. in stamps.

STRICTURE. STRICTURES AND URINARY FISTULAS.—Hundreds of cases of the worst form of strictures, many of them greatly aggravated by the careless use of instruments in the hands of inexperienced physicians and surgeons, causing false passages, urinary fistulæ, and other complications, annually consult us for relief and cure. That no case of this class is too difficult for the skill of our specialists is proved by cures reported in our illustrated treatise on these maladies, to which we refer with pride. To intrust this class of cases to physicians of small experience, is a dangerous proceeding. Many a man has been ruined for life by so doing, while thousands annually lose their lives through unskillful treatment. Send particulars of your case and ten cents in stamps for a large, Illustrated Treatise containing many testimonials.

NERVOUS DISEASES. Epileptic Convulsions, or Fits, Paralysis, or Palsy, Locomotor Ataxia, St. Vitus's Dance, Insomnia, or inability to sleep, and threatened insanity, Nervous Debility, and every variety of nervous affection, are treated by our specialists for these diseases with unusual success. See numerous cases reported in our different illustrated pamphlets on nervous diseases, any one of which will be sent for ten cents in postage stamps, when request for them is accompanied with a statement of a case for consultation, so that we may know which one of our Treatises to send.

DISEASES OF WOMEN. We have a Special Department, devoted exclusively to the treatment of Diseases of Women. Every case consulting our specialists, whether by letter or in person, is given the most careful and considerate attention. Important cases (and we get few which have not already baffled the skill of all the home physicians) have the benefit of a full Council of skilled specialists. Rooms for ladies in the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute are very private. Send ten cents in stamps for our Complete Treatise on Diseases of Women, illustrated with wood-cuts and colored plates (160 pages).

RADICAL CURE OF RUPTURE. HERNIA (Breach), or RUPTURE, no matter of how long standing, or of what size, is promptly and permanently cured by our specialists, without the knife and without dependence upon trusses. Abundant references. Send ten cents for our Illustrated Treatise.

PILES, FISTULÆ, and other diseases affecting the lower bowels, are treated with wonderful success. The worst cases of pile tumors, are permanently cured in fifteen to twenty days. Send ten cents for Illustrated Treatise.

WEAK MEN. Organic weakness, nervous debility, premature decline of the manly powers, involuntary losses, impaired memory, mental anxiety, absence of will-power, melancholy, weak back, and all affections arising from youthful indiscretions and pernicious, solitary practices, are speedily, thoroughly and permanently cured.

We, many years ago, established a Special Department for the treatment of these diseases, under the management of some of the most skillful physicians and surgeons on our Staff, in order that all who apply to us might receive all the advantages of a full Council of the most experienced specialists.

WE OFFER NO APOLOGY. We offer no apology for devoting so much attention to this neglected class of diseases, believing that no condition of humanity is too wretched to merit the sympathy and best services of the noble profession to which we belong. Why any medical man, intent on doing good and alleviating suffering, should shun such cases, we cannot imagine. Why any one should consider it otherwise than most honorable to cure the worst cases of these diseases, we cannot understand; and yet of all the other maladies which afflict mankind there is probably none about which physicians in general practice know so little. We shall, therefore, continue, as heretofore, to treat with our best consideration, sympathy, and skill, all applicants who are suffering from any of these delicate diseases.

CURED AT HOME. Most of these cases can be treated by us when at a distance as well as if here in person.

A Complete Treatise (136 pages) on these delicate diseases sent sealed, in plain envelope, secure from observation, on receipt of only ten cents, in stamps, for postage. All statements made and secrets confided to us will be held to be sacredly confidential.

All letters of inquiry, or of consultation, should be addressed to

LEONA DARE'S RECKLESSNESS.

Hanging by Her Teeth from a Balloon in Mid-air.

We greatly doubt the moral right of Miss Leona Dare, the aeronaut who ascended from the Crystal Palace on Monday, to risk her life as she does, even for the sake of getting a living by the exhibition of her courage. According to her own account, which was verified by 60,000 spectators on Monday, she ascends some mile and a half into the air (3,000 metres is her own estimate), hanging to a balloon by her own teeth, which are unusually strong. An iron bar is attached to a trapeze suspended from the car, to one end of which an india rubber mouthpiece or ball of that substance has been fitted. Miss Dare puts her mouth over this, closes her teeth, and is carried up by the balloon, supported by her teeth alone, to a height at which she is invisible from below. There she signals to two experienced assistants in the car, who lower a ladder, by which she ascends, being, of course, trained to all acrobatic feats, through a trapdoor into the basket; "then the basket is divided into two compartments by a shawl, and behind this partition I change my ballooning costume, which of necessity is very light, into an ordinary walking dress, so as to be able to go home without inconvenience when we descend." Miss Dare declares that she suffers no inconvenience beyond a surging in her ears, which lasts for some time after she has descended, and that through long exercise her teeth and jaws have become exceptionally strong and trained to bear the excessive fatigue which, it is plain, must fall to their share; but it is obvious, nevertheless, that her life must be in the most extreme peril. She does not like the balloon, she says, to start "with a jerk"—a remark betraying her consciousness of a most ugly possibility. The slightest faintness, the smallest defect in the bar, the shock of a moment's toothache, and she would fall among the gaping crowd—dead, we can but trust, before she reached the ground, but in any event crushed out of all recognition.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Dived From a Church Steeple.

In Vera Cruz a man committed suicide by jumping from the steeple of a church. He first threw down his hat, called on those below to get out of the way, and then balancing himself on his hands with his feet on the top of the clock dived off into space. Most of his bones were broken and yet he moved some little time after the fall.—Galveston News.

NOTED HUNCHBACKS.

Physical Peculiarities Which Have Become Famous.

Hunchbacks form a tolerably numerous list, says a writer in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for June. There is that brilliant soldier, the Marechal de Luxemburg, of whom Macauley writes in one of his most finished passages: "Highly descended and gifted as he was, he had with difficulty surmounted the obstacles which impeded him in the road to fame. If he owed much to the bounty of nature and fortune, he had suffered still more from their spite. His features were frightfully harsh; his stature was diminutive; a huge and pointed hump rose on his back." The reader knows the hunchbacked Richard of Shakspeare's powerful drama; but historical research seems to have delivered the King from his burden, and to have shown that he was only high shouldered. Lord Lytton, in his "Last of the Barons," has adopted the modern view: "Though the back was not curved," he says, "yet one shoulder was slightly higher than the other, which was the more observable from the evident pains he took to disguise it, and the gorgeous splendor, savoring of personal coxcombry—from which no Plantagenet was ever free—that he exhibited in his dress." The great minister of Queen Elizabeth, William Cecil, Lord Burleigh; the learned German theologian, Eber; our "glorious deliverer," William III.; the famous general of Spain, the Duke of Parma, these were all "crook backs." The poet Pope had a protuberance both on the back and in front, and one of his sides was contracted.

"She's Much Older Than Her Husband."

We heard a young girl make the above remark the other day about a lady with whom we are slightly acquainted. It was not true, yet the lady in question actually does look five years older than her husband, although she is several years his junior. She is prematurely aged, and functional derangement is the cause. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription would cure her, and should be recommended to her, and to all others who are in the same condition. If the reader of this chances to be a similar sufferer, let her get the "Prescription." It will bring back her lost beauty, and, better still, it will remove all those distressing symptoms which have made life a burden to her so long. Money refunded if it don't give satisfaction. See guarantee printed on bottle wrapper.

ITCHING PILES.

SYMPTOMS—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. DR. And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in his specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is confessedly at the head."

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The Durham base ball team recently downed the Markdale one. The latter chaps wouldn't play out the full innings when they found the tide of war setting in against them, so the umpire declared the game 9 to 0 in favor of Durham. The Markdale sports—with a few honorable exceptions—are "natural born kickers," and after while they will have nobody to play against except the Duncan Gorillas and Slabtown Slouchers.

Through the kindness of Mr. Mitchell, of the Durham Chronicle, we have received a report of the 31st Battalion Rifle Association's Annual Matches. Unfortunately it came too late for last week's ADVANCE, and it is too stale for this issue, as several newspapers have already published it. It is strange that the Association cannot manage to supply the local newspapers most interested simultaneously. The country press is quite as adverse to using old matter as the city press.

Owen Sound is putting in her best efforts in order to monopolize the High School business—and everything else she can grab. There are several County Councillors in Grey, who are mighty easily molded by the soft-sawder so unsparingly dealt out by the "powers that be" in Owen Sound. In fact we are afraid there are several in the ranks of Grey legislators, who will always be stumbling blocks to those who are in favor of a progressive, liberal and equitable policy in educational matters.

Irish Lake Picnic.

Thursday morning last opened up with a drizzling rain, which continued to fall until shortly after dinner, accompanied by high winds. Hundreds were thus prevented attending the great annual picnic at that charming spot, the Irish Lake. But, notwithstanding the unpropitious state of the weather, several hundred people from Markdale, Durham, Dundalk, Maxwell, Priceville, Flesherton and the immediate neighborhood were there. About one o'clock the heavy masses of clouds began to disperse, and by and by Old Sol got a chance occasionally to scatter a few bright, cheering rays of sunshine upon the bosom of Mother Earth. From this time until four o'clock a pretty steady stream of vehicles poured into the beautiful Parish Grounds adjoining Irish Lake; and eventually the gathering became a pretty large one. Had the weather been fine in the forenoon, the Picnic would probably have been one of the most successful ever held in the County. Considering all things it was a success.

Rev. Father Feeny worked with might and main in connection with the Picnic. During the day he received a large number of callers, to whom he extended the hospitalities of his house in that courteous and genial manner for which he is noted far and near. In this connection, we must not omit to mention the kindly offices performed in behalf of the visitors by the gentlemanly Father's sister, and housekeeper, Miss Ellen Feeny, who is a most amiable and accomplished young lady.

PICNIC NOTES.

Quite a number "tripped the light fantastic toe" during the day to the inspiring music by Messrs. Wm. Redmond (Violin), James Paton (Piccolo), J. R. Oldfield (Cornet) and W. Jennings (Organ).

The high wind, which prevailed during the whole day, made the Lake rather "lumpy" for boat racing.

Among the visitors present, we noticed Dr. Sproule, M.P. for East Grey, Markdale; Mr. P. McCullough, Barrister, Markdale; Mr. C. W. Rutledge, Editor of the Standard, Markdale; Mr. Mitchell, Editor of the Chronicle, Durham; and Mr. J. E. Marsh, landlord of the popular Markdale Hotel. Mr. Harry Bull, the famous baseballer, represented Thornbury at the Picnic.

The match between Flesherton and Markdale Lacrosse teams, for set of flags, came off according to announcement. The match was an exciting one throughout and some very fine playing was done on both sides. Flesherton won in three straights.

Priceville Pointers.

Mr. Fox, of Durham, is the contractor of the new Presbyterian church here. The stonework is approaching completion and every inch of it has the appearance of finished workmanship.

Mr. Lamont, the genial landlord of the Crown Hotel, has greatly improved this fine hostlery. In short the Crown Hotel has greatly improved under the new management. Priceville has two really first-class hotels now, affording ample accommodation to the travelling public.

The Calithumpian procession on Dominion Day created quite a sensation. Their hideous masks, varie-colored dresses, and absurd gestures and movements produced many an "open-mouthed" stare. One old lady said she came the whole distance to see them and "nossing else." "Well," snorted an old gentleman, who was standing near by, with disgust very plainly stamped on his features, "I sink you was more foolish than the crazy fools themselves!" However many enjoyed the absurd spectacle to the utmost, laughing heartily at the comical capers cut by Captain Gilhooly and company.

Mr. Thos. Atkinson, the popular landlord of the Commercial Hotel, is getting around nicely after his recent mishap.

Our friend, Mr. George Tryon, is doing a good business in the butchering line. He keeps the villagers and country people well supplied with fresh meat, and strives by honest dealing to extend his business operations. George is deserving of a hearty and unstinted patronage.

Detective McDonald refused to allow Mrs. Caswell on the school grounds on Dominion Day if she had any whiskey with her. "And now," says Mrs. C., "he wishes to—that I had brought some so that I could have given him a drop!"

The Campbells, brother and sister, of London, Ont., danced merrily and most gracefully to the excellent bagpipe music rendered by Mr. Hector McDonald on Dominion Day. The athletic games and sports were keenly contested.

Mr. A. McCabe, merchant, announces unprecedented bargains in every department in his well stocked general store. Call and see him when in Priceville. You will find everything sold at close prices and your wants will be courteously and promptly attended to.

An old lady came into a Priceville store one day not long since. On being asked what she had to dispose of, the old lady thus replied:—"I've got some butter in the beskit, an' Tonald's comin' ahint wuth the English!" She was a Highland lady and could only speak a few words of English.

Brander's and McCabe's store were thronged with customers on Dominion Day. They are live business men and advertise judiciously.

Somewhat Amusing.

From the Dundalk Herald.

Miss Bowes of the Shelburne Ladies' Band played a solo to a large and appreciative audience in Shelburne last Wednesday. Her first rendering of a waltz brought forth a loud peal of applause and encore after encore. She then bowed to the audience and began a jig tune, which captivated the audience until she took the cornet from her mouth and made a small retiring bow, but to the surprise of the audience kept on playing a few extra notes. Mr. Greenwood, leader of the gentlemens' band, was behind the screen and the delusion up to this point had been complete. There was no further encore and the young lady left the stage looking rather sad.

Mr. S. D. Gaudin who has been attending the Col. Inst. at Owen Sound for the past term, is now visiting friends in this vicinity.

Mrs. H. Bowerman and Miss G. Thurston have taken a short trip to Meaford via Heathcote and Thornbury for the benefit of the former's health.

Mrs. O. Drinkall is preparing to move to Toronto where her husband has procured a situation.

Poultry yards will have a relief from the ravages of hawks. The other day one of our young men went out hunting and succeeded in shooting three and capturing two young ones alive. They are of the Old Country falcon species and are now on exhibition at the "Travellers Home" here.

Mr. T. M. Thurston is the proud possessor of a new sign, on which is painted, "Travellers Home" with the emblem of our country, three maple leaves. This piece of work does credit to the painter, Mr. F. Thurston.

Mr. G. L. Thompson is erecting a new store and making preparations for a more extensive mercantile business.

A new bridge is soon to be built over the Beaver River on the fourth line near this place and as it is under the supervision of our competent carpenter and wagonmaker, Mr. James Fawcett, no doubts are entertained as to its being a first-class piece of workmanship.

Why You Feel

So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that, on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies:

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 381 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best

Lady Bank.

Correspondence of The Advance.

Mr. Editor,—I have often wondered that no person in this thriving vicinity took interest enough in the happenings of the neighborhood to make them public or to regale their intellects after the manual labor of the day or week to chronicle a few of the events that transpire from time to time for the benefit of their neighborhood and the public in general. I think this neighborhood as prolific of news as a great many places, and perhaps if the spell is broken some one will fall into line and keep us posted on matters tending to the general good and information of your readers and to the public in general.

One of the events of the day was a barn raising on the farm of Mr. R. Roberts. This structure is one of the finest and largest in the neighborhood. Size 42 x 60 with a stone foundation 9 ft. high under the entire building. The contractor for the frame work is Mr. James Potts and he has executed his contract in a masterly manner. I have not been able to learn the name of the contractor for the stone work. This is also cleverly done. Quite a number from the McIntyre settlement were present. The sides were Lady Bank against McIntyre. Messrs. T. Cooper and W. Mackenzie were captains. Cooper represented Lady Bank and Mckenzie represented McIntyre. Although there are some smart fellows on buildings here the McIntyre side proved themselves a little superior by getting on all their rafters complete before Lady Bank had a single plate on. However we do not feel discomfited and hope to try them again with better success next time. After the raising the young folks displayed their skill in gestic lore until the morning beams lit up the eastern horizon. One thing however we noticed throughout was the absence of the ladies of the neighborhood and a predominence of a select and favored number from a distance. However the neighboring ladies do not feel much chagrined at the sight. During the day Mr. Roberts received rather a severe bruise on the ankle between two pieces of timber, but he is able to be around again.

Miss Carr, school teacher at No. 6, entertained her scholars last Friday by holding a picnic in the woods back of the school. Quite an enjoyable time was spent.

Mr. John Linley also raised a frame stable 22 x 60 of his own workmanship and it compares favorably with that erected by other and more experienced mechanics. All the modest matrons and blushing maidens of the neighborhood were invited and a goodly number stayed for the customary entertainment after the raising.

The other night some disloyal persons visited the premises of Mr. Robt. Clements and cut the rope and broke the top of the flag pole that stands in his yard. The pole was estimated to be the highest in the country, its top being about 82 feet above ground. He however had the top fixed on again and its height is now about 76 feet. We admire his loyalty.

Mr. W. T. Paul has gone to Thornhill, Manitoba, to see the place preparatory to moving there should he like the country.

The road work was done here last week and as usual it was put on the side road where it accommodates the pathmaster and one or two more and the concession where it would be a benefit to all has received scarcely any attention for the last two or three years.

Editor Advance.

DEAR SIR,—I will offer no excuse for time between letters, only that we have nothing worth sending. We generally see by the ADVANCE—which comes pretty regular—that you are pretty much like us in B.C. and sure to have some kind of weather. Feb. came upon us with the temperature up to 80 degrees. Buds &c. began to swell, flowers tried to bloom and we began to rush work as if we were a month behind time, but March came along cold and raw, frost and snow yet light, and put an end to our dream. Feb. and March had simply traded places. Slight showers of hail up to middle of April but a great part of the seeding was done by that time. I very often when on R. R. Track stare into cars to see if any known faces are to be seen amongst the numerous passengers who are daily arriving. Allow me to say that the country has been too much boomed, and the Westminster and Vancouver papers are now trying to see which can boom its own little place the most. A great many come here to look for work. Think before you come here on any such lay out, there are too many already, but I suppose it is no use to say anything, they will come and plenty will find themselves like one of my boys who went a short distance into the bush. Presently I heard him call me. "Are you lost?" I asked. "No," he shouted back, "I'm here." Land hunters almost daily. Two have just left, admiring my place and perhaps envying it. Well, it does begin to look a little more like something.

Standing on the wharf the other day waiting the arrival of one of the boats I shouted to an acquaintance about the weather when presently my hand was grasped by a passenger and when he looked up, Billie Galbraith by all that's blue, and Mr. Rennie. Only a few minutes to talk. I don't give much encouragement to people to come here, he said. Oh no, because I find nine-tenths get disappointed. I am that already, he said, and he had only arrived the preceding day. Why, he said, I see nothing but mountains. Crops in general are looking well. Temperature 90 degrees in the shade. Land is all taken up around me, but mostly by young men and bachelors. Galbraith remarks they must be good to me here, for he never saw me looking better. How am that? Had a paper from my old friend, Geo. Blyth, Chatsworth. It was addressed to New Westminter but they began to know me and it was forwarded here. I don't think any of my family would care to go back east again except to visit. Chinaman are becoming beautifully scarce, saucy and independent We often wish for the same class of settlers that Artemesia has. We are terribly mixed, selfish and void of principle, mixed in nationalities, religion, politics and everything. Two more land hunters, one from Goderich and the other from near Barrie. This is the third attempt to finish this scribble. Very few salmon at River High on account of heat. We fear another dry summer. New fruit and potatoes for some time in Vancouver from California. We have just finished sowing turnips. Get this mixture in shape. Yours Truly,

J. M. WEBSTER,
Port Haney, B.C.

P. S.—Some time ago my wife sent a small sum of money in a letter but it seems it never reached its destination. Since then numerous letters have failed to reach parties to whom sent. Where the fault is I cannot say. However, if this is ever seen by the party they may just as well pass the letters because no more money can now be sent for the principle reason.

You Carry

A whole medicine chest in your pocket, with one box of Ayer's Pills. As they operate directly on the stomach and bowels, they indirectly affect every other organ of the body. When the stomach is out of order, the head is affected, digestion fails, the blood becomes impoverished, and you fall an easy victim to any prevalent disease. Miss M. E. Boyle, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., puts the whole truth in a nutshell, when she says: "I use no other medicine than Ayer's Pills. They are all that any one needs, and just splendid to save money in doctors' bills."

Here is an instance of

who lost his medicine chest, but, having at hand a bottle of Ayer's Pills, found himself fully equipped.—J. Arrison, M. D., of San José, Cal., writes:

"Some three years ago, by the merest accident, I was forced, so to speak, to prescribe Ayer's Cathartic Pills for several sick men among a party of engineers in the Sierra Nevada mountains, my medicine chest having been lost in crossing a mountain torrent. I was surprised and delighted at the action of the Pills, so much so, indeed, that I was led to a further trial of them, as well as of your Cherry Pectoral and Sarsaparilla. I have nothing but praise to offer in their favor."

John W. Brown, M. D., of Oceana, W. Va., writes: "I prescribe Ayer's Pills in my practice, and find them excellent. I urge their general use in families."

T. E. Hastings, M. D., of Baltimore, Md., writes: "That Ayer's Pills do control and cure the complaints for which they are designed, is as conclusively proven to me as anything possibly can be. They are the best cathartic and aperient within the reach of the profession."

FREDERICK AND VICTORIA.

What Manner of Man the Late Emperor Was—His Widow's Future.

A Berlin cable says: A large number of deathbed anecdotes and last sayings of the late Emperor should be taken with a large substantial grain of salt, for His Majesty could neither speak nor write during the closing days of his unhappy life. One of his physicians said: "His eyes talked, but that was all, and his own wish at all times was to have his royal consort near him. When she was by, he was content to wait the inevitable end. The love and devotion of the Empress were beautiful to behold. She was the solace and comfort of the Emperor in death, as she had been his dearest and constant friend in life.

I had a long talk with Dr. Persius, the spiritual adviser of the late Emperor. He said: "I have, perhaps, had better opportunity than any one else to study the late Emperor's character. I must say that to me his most prominent characteristic was his gentleness and breeding. He was a famous soldier, a just ruler, but, above all, he was a true, honest gentleman. No higher type of man has ever lived, for his smallest thoughts were noble and pure. It was because of this that Her Majesty the Empress requested me to read the service from the text, 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.'" The Emperor took the holy communion on Holy Thursday. His death was utterly painless. His last two days were passed in a serene contemplation of the uture.

The Imperial widow will go to Switzerland for the purpose of recuperating her health, after which she will take up her residence at Wilemshone Palace, near Cassel. It was in this palace that Napoleon III. was held a prisoner after Sedan. It was left to the Empress by the will of William I. The opinion that the Empress will spend most of her time in England, though nominally living in Germany, is generally entertained. In the coffin of the dead Emperor Her Majesty placed a small gold chain, to which three lockets were attached, containing miniatures which she had always worn until his last illness.

The royal widow's despatch to the Emperor's mother, who was at Baden when her son died, was as follows: "She, who was so happy and proud to be his wife, weeps with you, poor mother, for the loss of thy only son. No mother ever possessed such a son. Be calm and strong in thy grief. Even in his last moments he sent greetings to thee."

STANLEY IN BAD LUCK.

His Soudanese Allies Desert Him—He is Attacked by the Natives—Is Wounded and Surrounded by the Enemy—Help Needed.

A London cable says: A despatch from St. Paul de Loanda, dated yesterday, says several deserters from the Stanley expedition have reached Camp Yambunja. They state that, after traversing the Upper Aruwhimi, Stanley struck into a rough, mountainous country, covered with dense forests. The natives, who were excited by reports spread by the Arabs, disputed the passage of the expedition and there was continuous fighting. Stanley was severely wounded. He was compelled several times to construct camp in order to repel attacks and was obliged to use the reserve provisions that were intended for Emin Bey. The Soudanese attached to the force had all died or disappeared. The deserters estimate that the caravan lost one-third of its men, and they say that many of those remaining were ill, including the Europeans. Stanley was encamped when the deserters left. He was surrounded by hostiles and was unable to send news to Emin Bey or directly to Yambunja. Major Bartellot had returned to Yambunja, where he was awaiting the men. Mr. Ward was collecting to form a powerful expedition to go to the relief of Stanley. The sickness at Yambunja was lessening, but only 80 of the 125 Zanzibars survived. Tippoo Tib received 625 men to form two caravans and started for the interior about the end of January. Ward left Bana on May 30th for Leopoldville, where he was to embark the men and provisions in the Congo State steamer for the Aruwhimi. Early in May Stanley left Stanley Falls, taking Bartellot's first reinforcements and supplies. Yambunja advices reach the middle of April. The time the deserters left Stanley is uncertain. Governor Janssen left the Congo on the 15th inst. on his way to Europe to consult regarding the sending of assistance to Stanley.

POISONED HER CHILDREN

And Took the Fatal Drug Herself—Two Children and the Mother Dead.

A Pittsburg, Pa., despatch says: Early this morning Mrs. Josephine Morike, residing on Sycamore street, Allegheny, administered a dose of strychnine to each of her three children, aged respectively 8, 5 and 3 years, and then took a dose of the poison herself. At 11.15 o'clock the mother and two youngest children were dead and the oldest dying. The husband and father had left home but a few minutes before the poison was administered. He is a mill employee at Sheffenburger's rolling mills, and can assign no cause for his wife's terrible deed.

He Made Him Emperor.

A despatch from The Hague says: Dr. Mackenzie has started for London. In an interview with a reporter of the Dagblad to-day he said that he had parted on friendly terms with all the German doctors except one. He had been fully aware, he said, of the gangrenous nature of Emperor Frederick's malady since February, but if he had admitted it a regency would have been probable, which would have pleased a section opposed to the accession of Frederick. A communication from Dr. Mackenzie, which appears in the Lancet, shows that all hope of further prolonging Emperor Frederick's life was abandoned on the night of the 13th. "Throughout his illness," the doctor says, "the Emperor uttered no word of complaint and gave no sign of impatience. The doctors and servants who attended him will always cherish the memory of his grateful acknowledgments of services that ordinary patients exact as their right."

So Sweet that He Swallowed Her, Eh!

The sweet girl graduate is in our midst.—Memphis Avalanche.

OLD WORLD NEWS BY MAIL.

From England.

Mrs. Home, widow of the spiritualist, in a memoir of her husband just published, claims both Mr. Ruskin and Mr. Bright as converts to spiritualism. She prints letters from both addressed to her husband.

There are in England 347 female blacksmiths, who swing heavy hammers, and 9,138 women employed in nail making, who make nails for horseshoes, 10,522 women bind books and 2,302 assist in printing them.

Rev. Mr. Spurgeon's mother, who has been in failing health for a long time, died at Hastings last month, in her 73rd year. She was barely 20 when her famous son was born.

General Sir Andrew Clarke, speaking at Chatham on the 7th June, said the British volunteer forces, properly administered and associated with the regular army, was sufficient to repel invasion.

Nearly £250 has been subscribed for the memorial to the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," most of the subscribers being ladies. Mrs. Oliphant and Miss Mary Anderson are among the number.

From Ireland.

The late Col. King-Harman owned an estate of 44,000 acres in Ireland.

At Barrington's hospital, Limerick, on June 2nd, a man named Hanna died from hydrophobia.

A policeman in Westmeath murdered his sergeant on the 8th inst., and then killed himself.

Sloane & Sons' Sanitary Engineering Warehouse, Stephen's Green, Dublin, and Booth's Watch Factory adjoining, were destroyed by fire on the 7th of June.

The official ratcatcher of Armagh Workhouse, having killed 795 rats in that institution during twelve months, has been awarded £2 remuneration by a resolution of the Guardians.

T. Naughton, a wealthy farmer, was gored to death by a bull near his residence at Ballycassy, near Limerick, on the 5th of June. His remains were so mutilated as to be almost unrecognizable.

From Scotland.

Margaret Bisset, Huntly, is in custody, charged with poisoning her child.

The sittings of the Free Church Assembly at Inverness were brought to a close on June 5th. Next year's meeting of Assembly will be held in Edinburgh.

Mr. and Mrs. Russell, of Flowerhill, Airdrie, have just celebrated their diamond wedding in the house which they have occupied for 58 years of their married life.

Rev. A. D. Mackenzie, of Kilmorack, one of the few surviving ministers who attended the Inverness Assembly of 1845, preached in Gaelic in the new Assembly Hall recently. He is still hale and vigorous.

Aberdonians are greatly excited just now over a divorce case of J. Ferries, bookseller, against his wife and nine co-defenders. The wife says it is purely blackmail, and that other three have paid Ferries £80 to keep out their name.

The late Wm. McQuaker, a Glasgow hatter, has bequeathed the whole of his estate, which it is expected will realize £35,000, to the British and Foreign Unitarian Society in the support of the principles of Unitarian Christianity in Scotland.

At the High Court of Justiciary in Edinburgh on June 4th the Galashiels shooting case, in which Andrew Wood was charged with shooting his sweetheart at Galashiels on 29th February, was disposed of. He was acquitted on the ground of insanity.

Rev. George Ritchie, D. D., who was interred in the Dean Cemetery, Edinburgh, on May 31st, was the son of Rev. George Ritchie, D.D., one time minister of Tarbolton. He was 81 years of age, and in 1870 Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.

The weather in Scotland, especially in the Highlands, early in June was unusually severe. Long-continued hail and snowstorms were experienced in many districts, and nearly all the Grampians were white. So severe a storm in June has never been recorded, and the loss sustained by the sheep farmers must have been very great, many lambs having perished. At Balmoral snow fell for twenty-five hours one day and was lying several inches deep.

James Grant Ogilvie, ninth Earl of Seafield, died on the 5th inst. Deceased, who succeeded his nephew in the title, but not in the estates, represented the counties of Elgin and Nairn from 1868 to 1874. His Lordship was Vice-Lieutenant of Elginshire, Deputy-Lieutenant of Banffshire and Inverness-shire, and Hon. Colonel of the Elginshire Battalion of the Seaforth Highlanders. He, who was born in 1817 and was popular throughout Morayshire, is succeeded to the title by his son Francis William, Viscount Reidhaven, who was born in 1847 and is now in Australia.

Slips of the Tongue.

The tongue will sometimes make the most awkward slips. It is told of a clergyman in one of the towns near Boston that he had given him to read from the pulpit an announcement that "the Bellingham praying band" would conduct at the evening meeting; but by some strange perversity of the unruly member the congregation was astounded with the announcement that there would be a service by the "Prayingham belly-band."

A Natural Linguist.

Fond mamma (showing the baby to visitor): "Sh-h—he's asleep. The little darling. Isn't he the sweetest you ever saw?" Visitor (in awe-struck whisper): "Decidedly. Can he talk?" "Talk? I should think he could talk! Why, he can say 'goo' and 'ga' and 'yow.' Picked them up himself, too."

The Season Has Begun.

Mrs. Squilding—I suppose, Mrs. Snaggs, that your daughter graduates this year. When do the commencement exercises begin?

Mrs. Snaggs—Yes, dear Jennie will be through college next week. Dr. Firstly will preach the baccalaureate sermon next Sunday.

The death is recorded of Olaf Svendsen, a Norwegian flute player, who for many years ranked close to the head of the profession in London.

CURRENT TOPICS.

CHRISTIAN K. ROSS, the father of the lost Charlie Ross, seems to have a permanent place in the sympathies of his countrymen, and his movements are always read with interest. He has just been reappointed master warden for the port of Philadelphia for three years.

A CALIFORNIA firm made a contract with a party for lumber at $11 per 1,000 feet, provided the defendant would not sell in four counties to any one else. The plaintiff sued for $10,000 damages for breach of contract, and the lower and Supreme Court have denied the prayer on the ground that a trust is illegal and against public policy.

THE Gazette Geographique observes that the Andes Mountains are notably sinking. The altitude of Quito has been diminished 22 metres (75 feet) within 122 years, the Pichincha has sunk 66 metres (216 feet) during the same period, and its crater has sunk 129 metres (423 feet) in the last 25 years.

WORD comes from Salt Lake City that the Saints have bought 400,000 acres of land in the Mexican State of Chihuahua, and propose to establish a polygamous colony of great proportions. Doubt may be expressed, however, as to whether the Mormons would be permitted to settle in the great Catholic country of Mexico.

THE late Mr. Dennis Crofton, of Dublin has left £60,000 ($300,000) to religious and charitable institutions. Among the benefactions are $50,000 to the Episcopal Church of Ireland; $50,000 to the British and Foreign Bible Society and $75,000 to the Church Missionary Society for Africa and the east.

THERE died recently at Forthill, Dover, in his 91st year, Thomas B. Rutley, who, before the days of railways, conducted the bullion waggons between Dover and London. His books show that he had over twenty millions of specie under his care. His last consignment was two and a half tons of silver, which he brought from London and shipped in the Downs for the East India Company.

AMONG the inventive processes shown in the Glasgow Exhibition is one by a Sheffield firm, which demonstrates that steel, when mixed with manganese to the extent of 24 per cent., becomes almost non-susceptible to the influence of a magnet. As the non-susceptibility goes on increasing proportionally to the percentage of manganese, it is just possible that the proportion of 26 or 27 per cent. leaves the steel wholly non-magnetic in the sense that the poles of a magnet would fail to take up any fine particles. For watch building and nautical purposes this will be a very valuable contribution to the discoveries of the day.

THE Holmden farm, near Pithole, Pa., which was sold during the oil excitement of 1865 for $1,500,000, changed hands on Friday at a sale for taxes for less than $100. On this farm was the famous United States or Fraser Well, which started with a flow of 250 barrels a day in the winter of 1865, when oil was $1 a barrel. It is said that Thomas Holmden sold the farm to Duncan, Prather & Co., for $25,000, but his wife refused to sign the deed, and they paid her $50,000 more to overcome her objections. Subsequently this farm was sold to the Garden City Petroleum Company, of Chicago, for $1,500,000, of which $750,000 was paid in cash.

THERE is great excitement in Australia over the silver mines. Two or three companies out of nearly a thousand organized in Melbourne have paid dividends, and this has set the town in an uproar. New companies are organized every day, and the stock is immediately taken. Everybody is speculating in mining stock, and the fever runs as high as ever it did in San Francisco in the passionate days of the Comstock lode. Melbourne stock exchange seats that went begging at $1,000 a few months ago are now in demand at $7,000 and $8,000 each. There is but one result possible, and that is a reaction, heavy losses and financial depression.

GLASGOW has a system of automatic telephone call boxes. There are 76 of the boxes scattered about the city, and every subscriber has a key to them. A non-subscriber wanting to use them must first ring up the exchange and ask if the connection he desires can be made. If it can he drops the fee, which is either three pennies or six, according to the distance he wants to talk, into a hole in the box. The pennies as they fall break a circuit and ring a bell at the central office. When the bell has rung the required number of times the central office make the connection. At the end of the three minutes allowed for conversation the connection is broken automatically. The average time taken to put two persons in telephone communication in Glasgow is 35 seconds, in Birmingham 40, in Liverpool 32, and in Dundee 20. This was ascertained from the results of ten calls in each town.

THE United States Consul at Auckland, in a recent report, says that rabbits have so eaten out the ranges of New Zealand, that the capacity for maintaining sheep is greatly lessened, and the flocks have fallen off in numbers. At the Stock Conference of 1886 it was stated that rabbits reduced by a third the feeding capacity of the land, and that the weight of fleeces had decreased by 1 lb. to 1½ lbs. each. The number of lambs decreased from 30 to 40 per cent., while the death-rate increased from 3 to 13 per cent. Since 1882, when the Rabbit Act became law, Government has expended £7,000 on Crown Lands alone, and it is estimated that during the last eight years private persons have spent £2,400,000 in extirpating rabbits. The methods generally in favor are fencing, poisoned grain (generally phosphorized oats) and ferrets, weasels, and stoats.

HERE is an anonymous scrap blown hither by a cross-current of the regular journalistic breeze: The term bandana applies to the figure and not to the goods, color, size or quality of the handkerchief. The bandana figure is an arrangement of white blocks, about a quarter of an inch square, each with a round or square hole in the centre upon a background of solid color. The blocks are grouped in diamonds, squares, circles and other geometrical figures scattered over the handkerchief in any fashion that pleases. A border of white lines, dots, bars or bands surround the whole. They are made of either cotton or silk, and come chiefly in yellow, red and chocolate colors, with occasionally a lot of blue ones. The colors are always very deep and vivid. In size the smallest are about two feet square, and from that they run up to huge spreads large enough for a child's bed.

PLANS for a bridge across the Straits of Dover are said to have already been prepared by the Creusot Company and M. Hersent, the well-known contractor. This is on the authority of London Iron. The bridge is to be about twenty miles long, the superstructure to rise 160 feet above sea-level, and the span between the piers to be 1,600 feet. The bridge is to bear four lines of rails, and each of the piers will contain a place of refuge and be surmounted by a powerful light. The authors of the scheme believe the foundations may be laid by means of compressed-air bells, the mean depth of the channel being only about six fathoms, while the greatest depressions seldom reach ten fathoms. The estimated cost of the work is £32,000,000. The metallic framework will weigh 2,000,000 tons, and the construction will take about six years. The scheme will shortly be laid before an international technical committee, after which charters from the English and French governments will be applied for, no subvention being asked. Iron says, "The bridge scheme will go the same way as the tunnel scheme, of that we feel sure."

Married Four Miles from Land.

A unique and interesting ceremony was performed off the mouth of the Tyne on Tuesday. In the morning there arrived in the Tyne, on board the steamship Norge, a Norwegian lady, the intended bride of Capt. Marsteen, who arrived with his vessel on Friday. Soon after the arrival of the Norge, Mr. Ole, of Steenburg, having chartered the steam tug Brothers, and made every other arrangement for the interesting event, accompanied by a minister of the Norwegian Church and one of the English Church, boarded the tug at the new quay, and proceeded to sea a distance of some four miles, when, being outside of English jurisdiction, the happy pair were married on the open sea. The reason for so novel a procedure was the inability of Capt. Marsteen to remain in port over the number of days requisite before the marriage could be legally celebrated on shore. On the completion of the ceremony the Norwegian national flag was hoisted to the masthead, and signals were sent up to friends ashore.—Pall Mall Gazette.

A Death Tramp.

The other day an exhausted stranger dropped apparently dead in a Pittsburg street. He was carried into a drug store and slowly revived. Meanwhile it was noticed that the soles of his shoes had been worn away and that he clutched in his hand a note that read as follows: "Dear husband, do not come home until you have matched the inclosed sample of worsted. Your loving little wifey." Several married men present expressed surprise that the stranger had recovered at all. All the heroes of the country do not die on the battlefield.

One-Sided Error.

He (after a long and rapturous embrace)—Oh, my darling Aggie, how I love you!

She—I'm not Aggie. I'm her twin sister.

He—Why didn't you tell me?

She—I thought you knew.

A Casus Belli.

Ed—Why did you thrash Bill?

Al—Why, he said I didn't know nothing about English grammar.

ALL ABOUT EGGS.

Odds and Ends of Chat by an Expert Candler.

A man busily engaged in holding eggs up before a candle attracted the attention of a New York Sun reporter. An interview was the result, and here it is:

"What are you doing?"

"Candling eggs. You see I pick up each egg and hold it before the candle. The light shines through it. I can see at a glance whether it is cracked or specked or spoiled. If it is cracked I set it aside to be sold at a low price. Bakers and confectioners and some prudent families buy cracked eggs, and they are as good as any eggs not cracked, but they must be used within twenty-four hours."

"Is not that an old-fashioned way of testing eggs?"

"Yes; but experience proves it to be the best, and it is quick. An expert can candle 30,000 eggs a day. It has been tried to test eggs by water. A good egg will sink and a bad egg will float, but you cannot find out a specked egg that way."

"What makes specked eggs?"

"Lying in one position. An egg should not be left many days in one position. If an egg is turned every day it will keep a long time. An experiment was once tried by G. H. Dennis, President of the Dutchess County Creamery, as to how long an egg could be kept good. He kept one on his desk nine months, and turned it every day and it kept good."

"How long are the best eggs kept before they get upon the tables of the best hotels?"

"It takes about four days, because they are bought in bulk in the country and must be carefully assorted before being placed on the market."

"How are imported eggs kept from spoiling on the voyage?"

"They are carefully watched and turned. They come in cases easy to handle, and an expert soon learns to handle them quickly. It adds about a quarter a cent a dozen to the cost, but we can pay that and the freight and yet sell eggs that come from France and Germany cheaper than we sell Western eggs, and some think they are better. We can get them here in about twelve days from France. England also gets many eggs from Germany and France."

"How about desiccated eggs or canned eggs?"

"Some use them and say they are good and cheap."

"Why don't we use duck eggs and goose eggs? Why should substantially all the eggs in the market be hen eggs?"

"Because people prefer hen eggs, just as they prefer cow's milk to the milk of any other animal. Few people like the flavor of duck or goose eggs. The eggs of the shad are very palatable, however. But hens' eggs are universally liked, and they are good, strong, easily digested food, often relished by the sick."

Shopping for a Living.

Verily, the New York woman of to-day is rapidly multiplying her means of independent and honorable livelihood, writes a correspondent. The other day, in the throng of a great up-town dry-goods establishment, I encountered the manager at a moment when one eye was severely bent on business, while the other followed with an admiring glance the graceful and handsomely attired figure of a lady who had just swept by. Instinctively, my mind reverted to the ever-present shoplifter, and I asked whether he contemplated having this particular lady searched.

"Searched!" he ejaculated. "Why, she isn't a thief. She's a shopper."

"So are they all—all shoppers, are they not?"

"You don't understand. She's a professional shopper—buys on commission for people who live at a distance and can't get to the city. There are thousands of women who are willing to pay a slight advance in order to receive their goods from New York, because it sounds well among their friends, and they're always sure of being correct as to style."

"But how dare they trust a stranger?"

"Why, my dear sir, it's regular business. I suppose that there are at least 50 professional shoppers in this city. They advertise in many out-of-town papers, and send their personal circulars broadcast among a good class of people in other cities. They give first-class references as to ability and character, and that's enough. Take that woman that just passed for instance. If a lady in Massachusetts, Georgia or Kentucky writes to this house about her we recommend her, of course. Why? Because we know she's all right, and because her purchases foot up handsomely every month—the tribute's mutual, don't you see? Some of these shoppers make as much money as any salesman in an ordinary retail house. They receive a discount from the firm and add a commission to their customer's bill. Thus they dig the golden ditch at either end; but as they are blessed with brains and taste above the average, why shouldn't they?"

"Aqua Forty" Too Weak for Him.

He was an old-timer. He had commenced in early youth at hard cider, and had graduated in the liquids up to straight alcohol. He was in town this week, went into a drug store and picked up a bottle and poured out a full glass of something, swallowed it down, thinking it was spiritis frumenti. The druggist, noticing him with the empty glass in his hand, rushed back, exclaiming, "My God, man, you have drank aqua fortis!" "Was it?" said he. "Well, just give me a little aqua fifty. That last was kinder good, but I want something a leetle stronger." The druggist collapsed.

The names of Messrs. Andrew Robertson and Hugh McLennan, of Montreal, are already mentioned in connection with the vacancy in the Senate caused by the death of Senator Ferrier.

In the conservatory at Jay Gould's home, at Irvington-on-the-Hudson, there are not fewer than four hundred varieties of palms and tree ferns, besides a vast collection of smaller plants. The rose-house, which is perhaps the most delightful part of the conservatory, is filled with the finest summer and winter roses to be found in the United States.

Daughter—Mamma, the chimney sweep on the roof of the house has just kissed his hand to me. Mother—How shocking! Run at once into the bedroom and wash yourself.

FARM AND GARDEN.

Some Seasonable Hints for Rural and Other Readers.

Insects in Orchards.

One who has tried it states that burning scraps of old rubber, rubber boots or shoes, upon a pan of coals that is circulated among the trees of an orchard, will cause all insects to depart. This is a very simple means, but we should fear that they would return after a little time. The claim was that there was a sort of consistence to the smoke that adhered to leaves, blossoms and even the trunks of trees, which being repulsive to insects drives them away, and also holds its virtue for some time. If this is a reliable remedy it will be convenient to repel rose-bugs during their period of greatest injury.

Wool Cultivation.

Prof. Wm. Brown, of the Ontario Agricultural College, has issued an excellent bulletin on the "Better Cultivation of Wool." He holds that there is no justification by sound argument for the practice of washing, of clipping but once a year, nor of rarely taking wool from lambs. He says among other things:

The common practice is to leave clipping until June, or after spring seeding, when wool is in less quantity, dirtier, harsher, more ragged and not so sound for manufacturing purposes. We should have issued this bulletin earlier, with the strong advice: "Never let your wool go to grass." Even now it will be in time for many in other aspects. The few lines allowed in this public document do not admit of telling all the accompaniments of the change of practice recommended, among the most important of which would be that poor feeding and early spring clipping imply many deaths, an inferior crop, and nearly everything in correspondence. Much of the wool of a large flock after the long housing and dry feeding necessary in this country deteriorates before April; some of it leaves the skin, dries and consequently the whole fleece prematures and loses value. When removed two to four weeks before going out, there is such a stubble of new growth as sufficiently fends from sunshine and chilly mornings, supplemented as it should always be by the application in any case of a good "dip" in midsummer. And now comes what to me stands as a great mistake in management and the value of a crop of wool anywhere, namely, harvesting only once a year, and never clipping the lambs. We have already indicated the good resulting from early clipping and that sheep are decidedly more comfortable from it, and it is also our experience that clipping again in July is both beneficial to the animal and profitable to the owner. The extra wellddoing after April has produced upon good pasture a superior second crop, shorter and finer in texture relatively to kind. This is the stage claiming the better sample for certain fabrics, where also the longer, coarser varieties would and do actually give such a change as fetches a greater price per pound. Why do not flock-masters make this crop? There is not the shadow of cruelty about it, though it certainly means tree or shed shade and another turn of the dipping tub. Long before the chilly nights of September or the actual frost of winter comes—not forgetting it is not frost but wet that does most harm to sheep—the second growth is long and close, and ere next April, under good management, is equal in weight to what it would have been had clipping been done only once.

Altogether, then, we gather up the following comparison of the two systems as applicable to Ontario and the market today for unwashed wool, on an average of the breeds named:

Usual clip of 7 lb. in June, at 15c...		$1 05
First clip of 7 lb. in April, at 15c...	$1 05
Second clip in July, 3½ lb., at 10c...	52
Clip of Lamb, one per head of all the flock, 3 lb., at 17c.....	51
		2 08
Difference per head.....		$1 03

The extra cost of shearing and dipping amounts to 8 cents per head. I have recently advised with two extensive woollen manufacturers, and submitted samples of unwashed wool from all our breeds, upon which they set the following as the highest possible present market prices per pound:

FROM CLIP, APRIL AND MAY, 1888.

	Cts.	Lbs.
Lincoln	11	13½
Ontario grade	13	11½
Cotswold	13	11½
Leicester	13	11½
Oxford	15	10
Cheviot	16	9
Shrops	16	9
Hamps	16	9
Southdown	18	8
Merino	21	7

Taking the Merino as a standard and at an average weight of seven pounds per fleece in Ontario, I give in the second column the number of pounds per fleece required from the other breeds to make an equal value. It is significant of nature's impartiality that but one of the number, viz., the grade, fails to stand the comparison, as with that exception, which is three pounds too much, the actual average weight per fleece of all the breeds with us is very close upon the figures given.

Naked Fallows.

In speaking of naked fallows the Farm Home says: "A crop of ragweed on a stubble field is a real blessing in protecting the soil from the scorching sunshine of August, which is the season that the process of nutrification shows the greatest activity." If it is necessary that the soil should be covered with vegetation let it be with something of greater value than ragweed, which is upon any farm, especially when allowed to go to seed, as the seed appear to hold their vitality in the soil for years, and for that reason we should dislike to encourage its growth because of a possible benefit in another direction.

Other Farm Notes.

It is surprising to see what a great change a little paint will make in the appearance of farm buildings.

Poor, sandy soil should not be left uncultivated. Carefully prepare the land, sow to buckwheat and plough the buckwheat under when the crop is in blossom. In this way the land may be gradually made productive.

For mildew on grape vines.—Prepare by boiling three pounds each of flours of sulphur and lime in six gallons of water until reduced to two gallons. When settled pour off the clear liquid and bottle it. When used mix one part of the clear liquid in 100 parts of water.

The potato crop is one that usually pays. The average value of a crop should not be less than $50 per acre clear of expenses, though more can be made by selecting proper seed and giving good cultivation. The early crops are less liable to insect attack than the latter, but for winter keeping the late crops are better.

A cow should be milked out in five to eight minutes. It is hard work on the wrists and muscles, but it must be done or the cow will get a habit of dribbling the milk, which is very tiresome. To cure this habit, which has been brought on by slow milking, the milking should be done more quickly, and in time the trouble will disappear.

A contemporary gives three excellent hints: "An avenue of well-grown trees by the roadside makes a farm vastly more attractive, and costs little except the labor of setting. On high ground the sugar maple thus set will make a sugar grove after a few years. On lowlands the elm is a handsome tree, but its roots extend far into the fields, and are very likely to get into underdrains when the roadside is drained, as it should always be."

It is surprising what growth grape vines will make over an evergreen if given a chance to run. With only moderately rich soil the vine will entirely cover the tree, killing it after a few years. Its tendrils cling to the slender stems of the evergreen foliage and will not relax their hold. The higher the vine runs the finer the grapes and the harder they are to get. It is not a good way to give grape vines their will over any kind of trees. A low, neat trellis will cost but little and be every way more satisfactory.

Cheating the Bank.

"There are any number of people, sometimes, I think, as many as nine out of ten, who seem to think it no crime to cheat a bank," said a clerk in a financial institution to a Pittsburg Dispatch writer. "If there is a streak of meanness anywhere in a man's nature it will crop out when he is put to the test on a question of money. Sometimes I have amused myself by experimenting with men to find out whether they were honest. There is an easy way of ascertaining. For instance, a depositor hands in his bank book, together with a number of bills and checks, the amounts of which are to be placed to his credit. He has made out a deposit ticket, which he holds in his hand while I count the money. 'How much?' I ask. 'What do you make it?' he inquires. I name a sum $5 or $10 larger than I have ascertained the amount to be. If the man is honest he will say he thinks I am mistaken, but often he will turn around and make out another deposit ticket, fixing the amount to correspond with the figures I have given. Then, of course, I count the cash again and announce that I have made a mistake, and to prove it hand back the money and let him recount it. Men whom nobody would ever suspect of crookedness in business matters are often very quick to take advantage of a little mistake in their favor. I know several wealthy gentlemen who, I truly believe, would never think of paying back any sum, large or small, that got into their hands through a bank clerk's mistake."

Katy's Cousin on the Force.

Katy Mulcahy was out in the Central Park yesterday with her two little charges and had a great deal of trouble with the boy Walter, who would not keep off the grass. They had entered by the gate at Seventy-second street and strolled down to the heavy bench of chestnuts at the corner of the grand drive, where Katy met her big cousin on the Park police and rested a bit to give him the time o'day. When the cousin in gray was fully informed on the subject of time he strolled leisurely down the walk, and Katy called after Wally for the fiftieth time to come off the grass. He wouldn't and she threatened him with the policeman. Walter stopped and looked at the big bushy-whiskered officer and remained on the grass.

"Come off, I tell you," shouted Katy, "or I'll call that policeman, and he's very wicked."

"Wicked?" cried Wally, looking at his nurse with his eyes wide open.

"Yes, and he has a big stick, and there's no knowing what he might do to you."

"Well, if he has such a big stick and is so wicked why do you kiss him so often?"

"Because he's my cousin."

"That's no reason. I hate a cousin Maud, and I don't kiss her. I hate her," and he stayed on the grass.—New York Star.

If Not One, Why Then Another.

"Kin I git a marriage certificate, mister, with the gal's name left blank?" inquired an agriculturist.

"I guess so," was the reply; "what's the trouble?"

"None yet, but gals is like everything but death and taxes, mighty onsartin. There's goin' to be a wedding though, mister, and don't you forgit it."—Epoch.

In a More Delicate Form.

A little girl seeing her mother petting and caressing another child began to show unmistakable signs of jealousy. Her mother remarked: "Why, Sadie, I believe you are, jealous." "No, mamma," she replied indignantly. "I'm not jealous, but I don't feel comf'able."

Unnecessary Trouble.

Policeman (to Brown, who is clinging to a lamp post)—Shall I help you over to your house, Mr. Brown?

Brown—No, shunneshy. Housh be (hic) here in minute; can see it comin'. Been 'round twishe already.—Life.

The late Lady Buchan well remembered Napoleon Bonaparte at St. Helena, where her father was governor in 1815. When she was first introduced to him the ex-emperor said: "I have long heard from various quarters of your superior elegance and beauty, but now I am convinced that report has scarcely done you sufficient justice." And then, as she was soon to leave the island, he added. "You must be glad to get away." "O, no, sire," said she, "I am sorry to go." "Ah? Well, mademoiselle, I wish I could exchange places with you."

On the wagon sheet of a prairie schooner that passed through Orleans, Mo., from Kansas the other day, bound eastward, was the inscription: "Tryin' 2 git back 2 my wife's people. My name's Eli."

A TERRIBLE RIDE.

A Stage Coach Dashes Down a Mountain Side Behind a Runaway Team.

The stage passengers on the return trip from Julian two days ago experienced an exciting adventure in the shape of a runaway down a mountain road, in which the driver was thrown from his seat, three of the passengers injured, and all had a narrow escape from death on the rocks. Outside with the driver sat Marion Thresher, a little blue-eyed girl, 10 years old, and inside were five passengers, all men. As the stage was coming down a steep road on Stone's Hill, between Ramona and Ballena, forty-two miles distant from San Diego, the brakes gave way and the horses started on a jump down the precipitous mountain path. The driver realized the danger, and knew that unless the horses could be stopped within a quarter of a mile the stage and all its occupants would be dashed to death down the side of the cliff where the road entered a narrow mountain pass. He exerted every effort, but the frightened horses, with the heavy stage pressing upon them, almost tore the reins from his hands. They had not run far before the wheels struck a reef on the side of the road, and the stage almost went over on its side. The driver was thrown from his seat and dashed upon the rocky road. The little girl clung with both hands to the seat rail and kept her place upon the careening stage, but as she looked down upon the maddened horses tearing down the steep path to the cliff and chasm below she lost all hope. Soon another reef was struck, again the stage almost went over, and this time the strength of the child was not sufficient to withstand the shock. She was dashed out upon the stony roadbed and lay there bruised and senseless while the horses went tearing on. At the start the inside passengers had not suspected anything wrong, and it was not until they saw the driver fall upon the roadside that they knew their danger. Then they sprang to the opening to save themselves if possible. One of them, Sam M. Pearce, as he viewed the fearful prospect below and realized that if the cliff was reached all would be doomed to death, resolved to risk his life by a dangerous jump. The flinty roadbed made it almost certain that this step involved at least a broken limb, but as the stage flew past a clump of bushes he threw himself into it. The force of his fall was broken and, although badly bruised, he was not seriously injured. Mr. Rich, another passenger, followed, but did not escape so easily, for he sustained a broken ankle. On the other side of the stage the other three passengers were clinging and looking for an opportunity to leap, but on that side of the road, and almost grazing the horses and stage as they tore along, was a barbed wire fence. All gave themselves up for lost unless the stage should pass the wire fence before the cliff was reached. Suddenly there was a crash and a shock which threw some of the passengers violently against the front of the stage and one of them to the ground. One of the horses had fallen and the stage had been stopped within a few rods of the terrible cliff. The passengers in the stage, although badly frightened, were uninjured, and returning up the road they gave assistance to the wounded. Mr. Pearce, who jumped into the bushes, had already limped back to the little girl and picked her up. He found her lying senseless, terribly bruised, and with a broken arm. She soon returned to consciousness, and, opening her blue eyes, gave a piteous little moan, and then clinching her teeth, refused to give any further signs of her suffering. The driver, although badly bruised, was not disabled, and the stage was rigged up to proceed on the journey. The injured child was tenderly cared for by the passengers and brought to her friends in San Diego, to whom she was returning from a visit to the country. The thrilling adventure of that terrible stage ride is an experience which will never be forgotten by those who came dashing down the rocky road.

Queen Bess Ate with Her Fingers.

It is difficult to realize what a modern invention the table fork is. Queen Elizabeth never heard of one. She had, it is true, a few dainty forks, perhaps with crystal handles, for eating preserved fruit at dessert. But long after her time dinner forks were unknown in England. The very earliest now to be found belongs to the same nobleman whose hour-glass salt has been already spoken of, and these are not older than the middle of the reign of Charles II. The few early forks of the reign of George I. are three-pronged, and but few of our neighbors can show us four-pronged forks much before the reign of George III., from which time their fashion has remained unaltered to the present day, except for their handles, which have followed the fashions of spoons, finishing up with the familiar "fiddle pattern" of 19th century use. Before the days of forks the ewer and basin, which have now generally disappeared, were much in request after every course; whereas now the basin alone, with a little rose-water, makes its appearance at civic feasts after dinner, as a matter of fashion rather than necessity. Four out of five old basins have no doubt been melted up to supply the very forks whose invention rendered the washing of the fingers superfluous.—Murray's Magazine.

Misfortune Turned into Luck.

How often it is that what seem our misfortunes turn out to be the best of good luck. A Toronto merchant had a cargo of 67,000 bushels of No. 1 Manitoba hard hung up in the ice last winter at McKay's Harbor, in Lake Superior. It is just getting out now, and is worth eighteen cents a bushel more than when it was frozen in. Profit from the transaction $12,000, and no elevator charges to pay.—Toronto Globe.

Why He Was a Little Vexed.

"Adolphus, d'ye know that I'm a little vexed at Miss Simmons?" "What happened, Arthur, old boy?" "Well, you know, I pride myself on my singing. We were at the piano. 'I'll sing one more song and then go home,' I said. "Was it late?" "About midnight." "And what did she say?" "She said, 'Can't you go home first?'" "And did you?" "Yes, Adolphus. I tell you I'm a little vexed about it."

SAFEGUARDS AGAINST THIEVES.

A Reformed Burglar Tells Householders How to Protect Their Property.

First of all, I may say that the householder, especially if his house is situated in the suburbs, should count as next to nothing the protection afforded by the night policeman on his beat. I don't mean to insinuate that the night policeman neglects his duty. I believe that, as a rule, he performs it as well as he is able to, and it may be pretty safely relied on that at each time he passes a row of villas he will cast the light of his bull's eye over the front garden, if there is one, and over the house front, and lower windows and street door. If there is no front garden he will see that all is right and tight in the area as well. But his beat is a long one, and it is probable that he will not pass that way again for an hour or perhaps longer. So that if there is a job afoot all that those engaged in it have to do is to hide and see the policeman off, and they then know exactly how much time they have to get through their work before he can make his appearance again.

Speaking of my experience, and from that of others with whom I have been acquainted, I should say that at least a fourth part of the number of private house burglaries that are successfully committed are assisted by servants. But speaking of ordinary work it is the female servants who are made useful, and that quite innocently on their part. Masters and mistresses have no idea what easy simpletons many girls in service are, or how easily they are induced to betray the secrets of the house. And not only girls, but women cooks and housemaids, who are old enough to know better. A smart chap, with plenty to say and with money to spend, has but to scrape acquaintance with the kind of servants I am alluding to when they are out for church on Sunday and meet them a few times afterwards, and he can learn all he wants to know respecting the valuable stuff in the house and where it is kept, and the ways and habits of their employers and when they are at home and when away.

It is not often the burglar himself who in this way goes a-fishing for useful information. Generally speaking, he is not what may be called a "ladies' man." He is very well in his own line, but he hasn't got the good looks or the insinuating ways that go down with the fair sex. That part of the programme is intrusted to the "sweetstuff man." He is an affable, well spoken young fellow, very respectably dressed, and so respectable in his manner that even if he was caught in the kitchen with the servants at houses where followers are strictly prohibited his appearance would disarm suspicion. It should not be forgotten that the burglar has no particular desire in the pursuit of his calling to run his head into more danger than is necessary, and there is nothing that is so much to his liking as parapet work—getting in at attic windows that are screened by the roof parapet. Not one householder in a score gives a thought as to the security of the attic window. He will have his street door iron plated, with a patent lock on it, and a chain strong enough to hold an elephant, but a catch that can be put back with a bradawl is good enough for the attic window, and all the time it is quite as easy to enter by one way as the other—if the houses stand in a row and one of them happens to be empty. This is one of the opportunities the fraternity are always on the lookout for. Nothing can be easier than to enter an unoccupied house at the basement, and once within all a man has to do is to walk upstairs and get out on to the parapet, and there, well screened from view by the coping, he can creep on his hands and knees, and by means of the attic windows get into any house he has a fancy for. If it is winter time, and after dark, he will have no difficulty in taking stock of the front windows before he makes the ascent, and so ascertaining which of the front rooms are occupied or if the family are at dinner. If the latter he can be pretty sure that the servants are all down stairs, and he can explore the upper rooms without much fear of interruption. This wouldn't be called in the profession tip-top work, but it is a means by which householders lose a considerable amount of portable property, and it very rarely happens that the robber is caught in the act.

As regards house fastenings there is, in my opinion, nothing safer for windows than a long thumb screw in a socket, going right through the frame and deep into the sash on both sides of the window. I don't know if there have been any wonderful inventions in that way since I took an interest in such things, but I never saw a door fastener except the thumb screw that should give a workman a minute's trouble. For the street door there is nothing so good as a flat bar fastened to a pivot to the centre, so that it will extend across the jambs and drop into slots made on the plan of a watch and chain swivel. For window shutters the cheapest and best protection is a lightly hung bell on a coil spring. But better than locks, bolts and bars is a wiry little dog that, roaming loose, will open his pipes and let all the house know it the moment he hears a suspicious noise at door or window.—London Telegraph.

A Hard Problem.

"If we could only be children for ever," wistfully says a writer in the San Francisco Chronicle, and then proceeds to show how much more fun a child has than a grown-up person: "I sometimes look at a pretty boy and think what a pity it is to think that he is bound to grow up and become a man, and get married and drunk and wicked and all sorts of horrible things. And when you look at the blue-eyed, fair-haired little female child and think that some day she is going to be a pretty woman with a tight-laced waist, a tailor made suit false hair, and a touch of paint on her face; that she is going to fib and flirt, and deceive and marry the wrong man, and have lots of trouble—well, you can't help asking, 'What is the use of it all?'"

HORRORS OF SIBERIA.

Exile Provinces Where the Mercury Stands for Months at 50 Below Zero—A Marvellous Transition.

"It is hardly necessary to say that a country which has an area of five and a half million square miles, and which extends in latitude as far as from the southern extremity of Greenland to the island of Cuba, must present great diversities of climate, topography and vegetation, and cannot be everywhere a barren arctic waste. A mere glance at a map is sufficient to show that a considerable part of Western Siberia lies farther south than Nice, Venice or Milan, and that the southern boundary of the Siberian Province of Semirechinsk is nearer the equator than Naples. In a country which thus stretches from the latitude of Italy to the latitude of Central Greenland, one would naturally expect to find, and as a matter of fact one does find, many varieties of climate and scenery. In some parts of the Province of Yakutsk the mean temperature of the month of January is more than 50 degrees below zero, Fahr., while in the Province of Semipalatinsk the mean temperature of the month of July is 72 degrees above, and such maximum temperatures as 95 and 100 degrees in the shade are comparatively common. On Taimyr peninsula, east of the Gulf of Ob, the permanently frozen ground thaws out in summer to a depth of only a few inches, and supports but a scanty vegetation of berry bushes and moss, while in the southern part of Western Siberia watermelons and cantaloupes are a profitable crop, tobacco is grown upon thousands of plantations, and the peasants harvest annually more than 50,000,000 bushels of grain. The fact which I desire especially to impress upon the mind of the reader is that Siberia is not everywhere uniform and homogeneous. The northern part of the country differs from the southern part quite as much as the Hudson Bay Territory differs from Kentucky; and it is as great a mistake to attribute the cold and barrenness of the Lena Delta to the whole of Siberia as it would be to attribute the cold and barrenness of King William Land to the whole of North America.

"To the traveller who crosses the Urals for the first time in June nothing is more surprising than the fervent heat of Siberian sunshine and the extraordinary beauty and profusion of Siberian flowers. Although we had been partly prepared, by our voyage up the Kama, for the experience which awaited us on the other side of the mountains, we were fairly astonished upon the threshold of Western Siberia by the scenery, the weather and the flora. In the fertile, blossoming country presented to us as we rode swiftly eastward into the Province of Tobolsk, there was absolutely nothing even remotely to suggest an arctic region. If we had been blindfolded and transported to it suddenly in the middle of a sunny afternoon, we could never have guessed to what part of the world we had been taken. The sky was clear and blue and the air as soft as the sky and the air of California; the trees were all in full leaf; birds were singing over the flowery meadows and in the clumps of birches by the roadside; there was a drowsy hum of bees and a faint fragrance of flowers and verdure in the air, and the sunshine was as warm and bright as that of a June afternoon in the most favored part of the temperate zone."—George Kennon in the "Century."

Danger in Strawberries.

"People should be careful about how they eat strawberries," said a prominent physician yesterday. He had been interrogated as to several cases of "poisoning" and cutaneous affections that had followed as results of too hearty indulgence in the luscious fruit. Many folks have been alarmed by a species of "rash" breaking out on their bodies after eating strawberries. Several physicians, among them one or two who make a specialty of cutaneous diseases, were interviewed on the subject yesterday. The effect produced on certain people by the consumption of strawberries can only be accounted for by the medical profession on the grounds of "constitutional idiosyncrasy." With some peculiarly constituted organizations strawberries act as a laxative, with others as an astringent. It is supposed that the tiny seeds of the berry lodging in the cavities of the intestines produce the various evil effects. Again, the acidulous nature of the fruit proves hurtful in many cases to the stomach. The eating of strawberries, however, may be regarded as harmless to ordinarily constituted people—except, perhaps, the young man who has to settle the bill for the three or four platefuls consumed by his best girl.—Philadelphia Record.

A Lonesome White Man.

For the past nineteen years an Italian named Valpreda has been the sole representative of the Caucasian race living on the shores of Lake Tchad, in Africa. He went there as the servant of Dr. Nachtigal, one of the few explorers who have visited that region, and, imagining that as the only white resident of those parts he could cut an important figure, he deserted his master, became a Mohammedan, took unto himself several native wives, and entered the military service of the Sultan of Bornu. His glittering hopes, it appears, have not been realized, and a caravan the other day brought a manuscript wail from Mr. Valpreda to the effect that he would rather be a street laborer in Rome than have all the good things an African sultan can give him. The Sultan seems unwilling to spare the only white man who graced his court, but the Italian Government has decided to ascertain if a handsome present won't tempt His Higness to get along without Mr. Valpreda's society.

Wisdom Will Come to Him.

"Let me see your tongue, madame, please," said the doctor, and he added facetiously, as the request was complied with: "It is not necessary to expose the entire length of it."

The indignant patient drew in her tongue and gave the thoughtless young physician a piece of it.

One of the Indian children drilling for exhibition expressed his nervousness in this way to his teacher: "Too many eyes look at me. I scare, I scare!"—Carlisle (Penn.) Red Man.

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines,

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams, etc., are all symptoms of this terrible evil, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, unqualified for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

Heathcote downed Thornbury at football recently.

A burglar proof safe weighing 1100 lbs. has been placed in the C. P. R. station at Dundalk.

Mr. H. D. Burritt, formerly of Thornbury, has been elected Reeve of Vancouver city, B. C.

Gas has been discovered about three miles East of Thornbury, and now a well is to be sunk within the limits of that town.

Dundalk scamps planted a lot of turnip seed in the flour beds at school. Another instance of a human turnip head "going to seed."

At the Flos picnic, Miss McAvoy, while opening a pop bottle, accidently cut the artery in her wrist, and, but for timely medical assistance, might have bled to death.—[Stayner Sun.

Two Buffalo gentlemen last week from a fishing trip on the Manitoulin, brought down with them over two thousand of the speckled beauties. The two fishermen were no light-weights, tipping the scales at 700 pounds.—[Owen Sound Times.

On the 11th of May last Captain Moodie celebrated the fortieth anniversary of his coming to Durham. During that time he has seen many changes. Very few of those who settled here as early as he did are now living.—[Durham Chronicle.

Yesterday Mr. Geo. August, son of Wm. August, Esq., Auguston, was united in wedlock to Miss Mary Elizabeth Rutledge, daughter of Mr. Geo. Rutledge, Mulmur. The ceremony took place at the residence of the bride's father. We wish the young couple all prosperity and happiness.—[Shelburne Economist.

Contagious pleuro-pneumonia has been found by an expert veterinary among some stock on the farm of Mr. McInnis, Sullivan township. Three valuable cows have died. A fourth animal is under treatment, but is carefully isolated, and it is expected that this will prevent the spread of the disease in the neighborhood.

On Saturday last an Indian half breed boot-black from Owen Sound struck town and did such a rushing business that a second one joined in the enterprise on Monday. The second boot-black came from Honeywood and ran the other fellow out. His father came to town on Tuesday to search for his son who had ran away and when the boy heard of it he went up to Flesherton and now we have no boot-black.—[Dundalk Herald.

A BRUTAL OUTRAGE.—We are informed that last week some malicious party cut off the tails from four cows belonging to Mr. John True, of Dunedin. The case is a scandalous one, and if the party guilty of the crime has a conscience at all, he must feel small enough to crawl through the eye of a needle when he thinks of his cowardly treatment of the poor dumb brutes.—[Collingwood Enterprise.

A child of Mr. Jos. Loughead's, aged 6 years, fell into a well 42 feet deep on Wednesday of last week. The child lit on its feet on one of Mr. Young's creamers attached to a rope. There was about eight feet of water in the well, and the poor little fellow clung to the rope till help came in the person of his uncle, Mr. J. Loughead, who was at the place at the time. The child was all right except a few scratches on the face and left arm.—[Thornbury Standard.

Chas. Caughlan, of Owen Sound, was drowned in the Georgian Bay, near Bay View, on Sunday week. It appears he and a companion were out in a boat when they noticed a fish buoy. Desiring to see what was in the net, Caughlan commenced to raise it. Some way the net caught on a suspender button, and, being heavily weighted, the unfortunate young man was suddenly drawn out of the boat into the water and drowned ere assistance could be obtained. He was 45 years old.

FIRE IN GLENELG.—On Tuesday night about eleven o'clock the steam saw mill, of Mr. Wellington Banks, near Hayward's falls, Glenelg, was found to be on fire. As the fire had made considerable headway before being discovered it was impossible to put it out, and the mill and machinery along with some lumber were destroyed. The mill has only been running a short time, and Mr. Banks' loss will be about $1,000. He had no insurance but the Co. from whom he got the machinery held a policy for $500. The origin of the fire was unknown but probably started from the furnace of the boiler.—[Grey Review.

Artemesia Council met in Town Hall on Monday. Report of proceedings will appear in next week's ADVANCE.

Mr. C. J. Leitch has removed his house and shop to his new premises on Collingwood street, opposite The Medical Hall.

The Union Picnic of the Presbyterian and Methodist Sabbath Schools, Flesherton, came off with great eclat on the Beaver meadow, Tuesday afternoon last. There was a very large attendance of children and visitors.

Mr. Will Clayton will shortly commence business in the watch and Jewelry lines in Clarksburg. We can most heartily recommend friend Will to the good people of Clarksburg, Thornbury and surrounding country as a first class workman and a good citizen.

Thorough some postal irregularity, a letter from Dr. Sinclair, the celebrated Toronto specialist, to the Editor of THE ADVANCE—announcing the Dr's. visit to Flesherton in June— was never received at this office. The Doctor's patients will therefore understand that his visit was not announced in this paper at that time. By notice elsewhere, it will be seen that Dr. Sinclair will be at Munshaw's Hotel, Flesherton, two days this month, viz., Monday and Tuesday, July 23rd and 24th. Make a note of this fact.

Dr. Sinclair's Visit.

The eminent Specialist for the treatment of all Chronic Diseases, Dr. Sinclair, of Toronto, will visit Flesherton on Monday and Tuesday, July 23rd and 24th, inst., for the practice of his profession. He will be found at Munshaw's Hotel as usual. Diseases of the Heart and Lungs positively treated successfully, unless too far advanced. Private Diseases, Diseases of the Brain and Nerve. Remember the date.—Monday and Tuesday, July 23rd and 24, inst.

A Markdale Item.

We hear that License Inspector Campbell has been paying marked attention to certain parties in Markdale, who have been violating the law regulating the sale of intoxicants. Several citizens have been fined $20 and costs each, we are told, and "yet there s more to follow." Our "eagle-eyed" reporters will furnish us with more definite information for publication in the near future. It has been suggested, that the License Inspector take up his abode permanently in Markdale, as he is there a good part of his time anyway. Under any circumstances the Markdale liquor law violators are not and never will be smart enough to elude the vigilance of such an efficient License Inspector as James Campbell, Esq.

Removed to New Premises.

Leitch's popular tailoring establishment has been removed to the handsome new premises opposite Medical Hall, Collingwood street, Flesherton, where business will be attended to in the usual excellent and prompt manner.

Our Bank.

The premises in Richardson's block intended for Flesherton's new banking institution is being fitted up for the purpose as expeditiously as possible. The Manager is expected to arrive in town latter part of this week.

Our Cheese Factory.

The Government Inspector of Cheese Factories inspected the Flesherton factory on Monday last and rated it No. 1. He also spoke in high terms of the outfit, management and quality of products, and said it was the best factory he had seen since leaving the West of Ontario.

Very Successful.

Miss Lizzie Richardson was awarded full certificate for drawing at the recent examinations in connection with the Owen Sound Collegiate Institute. She was one of six successful candidates, and considering the short time she has been attending the Institute, her success is considered by competent judges as something brilliant. Miss Lizzie is the third daughter of Squire M. Richardson, of this place.

One Week's Work.

To give our patrons and the public generally some conception of the facilities possessed by THE ADVANCE printing office for the neat and rapid execution of Job work, we may mention, as an instance, that the Osprey Voters' List was mailed to us by the genial Clerk, Wm. Milne, Esq., latter part of last week. We have printed and bound 200 copies of the same, containing over 40 pages of rule and figure work, in an artistic manner, attended to our ordinary Job work, and got out this issue of THE ADVANCE—all inside of one week! And yet we are not satisfied, for we hope in the near future to beat this record.

The Sleeping Sentinel.

A business man, who does not live ten miles from Flesherton, fell asleep in his shop one evening last week. The hours flew by and still he slept on, the lamp burning brightly all the time. At midnight two passers-by observed the recumbent figure. They thought it a pity to see the coal oil going to waste, so one of them quietly stepped in and extinguished the light. Some time afterwards the sleeper awoke and discovering that the light was out, the bed hard, and the streets deserted, he made a bee line for home.

Plant This in Your Memory.

There are quite a number of visitors in Flesherton and neighborhood just now. Some people feel annoyed because we omit names of visitors occasionally, forgetting the fact that it is not the Editor's duty, much less his inclination, to go nosing around private residences in quest of items of this nature, however interesting they may be to his readers. If people will only take the slight trouble to furnish us with the names and places of abode of their guests, THE ADVANCE will most cheerfully give publicity to the same. Please remember this.

TO THE DEAF.—A Person cured of Deafness and noises in the head of 23 years' standing by a simple remedy, will send a description of it FREE to any Person who applies to NICHOLSON, 30 St. John St., Montreal.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

Personal Pointers.

Miss Spink, of Toronto, is the guest of Squire Richardson.

A daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Reid is visiting friends here.

Miss Page is the guest of her aunt, Mrs. A. Munshaw.

Mrs. T. Chislett and son, of Collingwood, are the guests of Mrs. A. Down, sr., Artemesia.

Mr. J. L. Wilson, a well-known resident of Euphrasia, called at the THE ADVANCE office one day last week.

Mr. Wm. Suggitt, who is now in England, writes us a letter under date of the 15th ult. We will publish it next week.

A sister of Mrs. J. W. Shilton, is a guest at the Methodist parsonage. The lady hails from the "Ambitious City, Hamilton.

Dr. Christoe, the energetic and popular Reeve of Artemesia, is attending the National Division, Sons of Temperance in Toronto this week, representing Flesherton lodge. The National Division is composed of representative men from all parts of the United States and Canada, and is, therefore, a very important gathering. It is many years now since the National Division last met in Canada.

"One Thing Thou Lackest."

Rev. W. A. Hunter, M. A., of Orangeville, preached anniversary sermons in the Presbyterian church here last Sunday morning and evening, to large congregations. In the evening the church was crowded to the doors, when the Rev gentleman preached a most eloquent sermon from the words—"One Thing Thou Lackest." The speaker first proceeded to tell the story of the young man who came to Jesus—so well known to Bible readers. The young man in question lacked but one thing to become a consistent follower of Jesus Christ, viz., he could not submit to the test of self sacrifice. A man may lead a moral life, attend worship, endorse the Confession of Faith, but if he is lacking in the one element of faith he is no Christian Outward show is not evidence of true piety unless the heart is at peace with God. A chain is no stronger than one of its links; a fence is no higher than its lowest panel. We must keep all the commandments—no element can be lacking in the Christian. The angels of heaven mingle their tears with those of godly men upon the earth, when people in high positions as well as in low, have fallen, pierced to the heart, through lacking in one necessary element of Christian character. What shall a man profit if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul. Who would exchange the senses of hearing and sight for anything this life could afford—never more hearing the sweet strains of music, or beholding the the beauties of nature? And yet how infinitely more important the soul itself, of which those were merely thresholds But withal there were men who did this and considered themselves smart' "Sin," said the Rev. Mr. Hunter in conclusion; "is the greatest madness in the world, and a sinner is the greatest fool in the world."

Fortify the system, by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, against the diseases peculiar to hot weather. This medicine induces a healthy action of the stomach, liver, and kidneys, causing them to prevent the accumulation of the poisons which produce disease.

How the Body of Ben Harrison's Father was Found.

A Cincinnati despatch says: The nomination of Gen. Ben. Harrison has set the tongues of all of the antiquarian gossips to wagging, and everything connected with the family history, from "Old Tippecanoe's" day to the present, is recalled and repeated, including the most novel and ghastly incident, that of the stealing of the body of Gen. Ben's father from the family graveyard at North Bend and its subsequent finding in the "well" of a medical college in this city.

John Scott Harrison, the nominee's father, was a son of President William Henry Harrison. He lived at North Bend, about 25 miles below Cincinnati, near the Indiana line, on the not very large or productive farm that was all his famous father left him except his name, the "log cabin" which became so famous in the "hard cider, Tippecanoe and Tyler too" campaign of 1840. It was not a cabin in the sense in which it was used in the campaign, but a very comfortable, old-fashioned, roomy two-story frame house, flanked with porches and shaded by a row of magnificent locust trees, a number of which still stand to mark the spot where the old home, destroyed by fire about 30 years ago, stood. The real cabin part of the structure was an old log house of early date, against which the General had built his more pretentious mansion when, after his distinguished early career as warrior and statesman, he settled down in comparative poverty to make a living out of his farm. The cabin proper, its logs concealed by weather boarding, was used as a kitchen. Here lived and died General Ben's father, John Scott Harrison, a kindly, lovable man of scholarly habits and artistic tastes that his limited income did not always enable him to fully gratify. He lived the life of a gentleman farmer, respected by all of his acquaintances and "loved by all the children and dogs of the neighborhood." He was a man of not very great force of character, devoid of ambition for distinction and particularly adverse to the pursuit of practical politics and to mixing himself up in the contentions and squabbles of the period, and yet the fates had fixed upon him to be the figure-head in one of the bitterest political contests ever fought in the State.

The leaders of the party of that queer amalgamation of Knownothingism and Free Soilism known as the American party, out of which was afterwards born the Republican party, at the Philadelphia Convention of 1856, in casting about for a candidate for Congress in the Second Ohio District, hit upon John Scott Harrison, and without an effort on his part, almost without his knowledge while the plan was hatching, he was nominated and elected. Old "Pap" Taylor, editor of the Evening Times, the organ of radical Knownothingism, and candidate for Mayor on the "American" city ticket against Jas. J. Faron, by whom he was defeated, was credited at the time with the discovery and resurrection of the son of old Tippecanoe, and probably deserved the distinction. Mr. Harrison served one term in Congress, achieving no distinction, and again returned to pastoral pursuits at North Bend. His regular habits, serene temperament and pleasant surroundings gave him length of years, and he became the patriarch of the place; but to the end of his day his chief distinction was that of being the son of his father, and as such his erect form and flowing white beard were pointed out to the occasional tourist, along with the old locust trees, the site of the "cabin" and the tomb on the hill as one of the sights to be seen at North Bend. Suddenly he was stricken with a mysterious disease that baffled the skill of the doctors, which in a comparatively short time carried him off. The funeral services were held at the little church in the old village of Cleves hard by, and the body was interred in the old family burying ground on the rounded summit of the old promontory that marks the "Bend" in the Ohio that gives the place its name. Either because the family feared that the peculiar character of the malady to which he succumbed would make his body tempting to the medical fraternity or the general fear engendered by the prevalence of body-snatching in the vicinity of Cincinnati at the time, extra precautions were taken to preserve the grave from desecration. It was made unusually deep, was walled and cemented, and a huge slab of stone placed midway between the metal casket and the surface, and guards were nightly stationed in the graveyard. In spite of these precautions, however, a few days later, the ghouls tunneled the brick work, pried the big stone partly out of place and stole the body. How this great work was accomplished without the knowledge of the guards was a mystery. They were suspected and arrested, but nothing came of it. By a curious coincidence about the same time, but before the desecration of the Harrison grave had been discovered, another grave in the vicinity had been robbed and some of the Harrison family were among the party of citizens who had gone to Cincinnati to employ detectives and search for the missing body.

While engaged in this work news of the disappearance of Mr. Harrison's body reached them, and their efforts to discover the ghoulish marauders and recover the bodies were redoubled. Col. Tom Snellbaker, then chief of police, was appealed to, and consented to take the case in hand. His first move was to go all through the medical colleges with a drag net, himself taking charge of that drawn through the Ohio College, on Sixth street, near Vine, one of the oldest and most prominent in the West. The building was searched from cellar to roof, the "stiffs" in the pickling vats fished out and examined one by one, the half-carved subjects on the tables in the dissecting room scrutinized, but without finding a trace of the bodies from North Bend, and the search was about to be abandoned, when it occurred to Col. Snellbaker to take a look in the "well" or chute, by which subjects and other heavy bodies were raised to the upper floor by means of a windlass. He found the rope taut, and in the bare hope that the object of their search might be at the other end of it, laid hold of the arms of the windlass and began to haul up. Slowly the weight at the end of the rope approached the surface, and the face of the janitor, who had conducted the searching party over the building, grew paler and paler. When the object reached the surface of the floor, it was discovered to be a corpse, with the loop of the rope about the neck. Throwing back the remnants of the shroud that fell over the face, the horrified searchers saw the face of a venerable man with white, flowing beard.

Gen. Ben Harrison's brother and nephew were among the party, and as soon as the brother caught sight of the partially concealed face he advanced, trembling and pale, and when the full truth was revealed by the removal of the tattered remnant of the shroud, shouting "My God! that is father!" fell back in a swoon. Col. Snellbaker at once placed the terrified janitor under arrest. The body was removed to an undertaker's and again prepared for the grave. Gen. Ben Harrison, who after the funeral had returned to Indianapolis, was telegraphed to as soon as the discovery was made, and used all haste to reach Cincinnati, arriving a few hours after the body ad been found. He bent every energy to he detection and punishment of the perpetrators of the crime, but without result. Some others besides the janitor were arrested. There was some talk of indicting the faculty. The few facts gathered were laid before the Grand Jury, but nothing came of it, and to this day nobody knows the history of the journey of John Scott Harrison's body from its peaceful grave at North Bend to the end of the rope in the horrible well of the Ohio Medical College, where it was found.

MARRIED IN A HURRY.

They Missed a Train in a Village and Wedded to Prevent Scandal.

A New York despatch says: Last Thursday afternoon a well-dressed young man and a remarkably pretty girl were seen dining at Clifton, L.I. After dinner the couple sauntered out, and later were billing and cooing on the beach. At 11.30 p.m. the two lovers appeared at the station too late for the last train. The young lady began to cry, and her escort endeavored to cheer her by telling her he was sure he could find some way of getting back to New York that night. She said she would not for the world stay there all night. The young man was plentifully supplied with money, and went to a livery stable and tried to hire a man to row or sail them across the bay to New York, but there was no one who wished to undertake the job.

The disappointed couple then retired to a restaurant near by and held a consultation. They concluded that it was impossible to get back to New York that night. Miss Ida Roorke (the girl) cried again, and her lover, George Reich, tried to comfort her, but to no purpose. The situation was getting desperate, and Reich decided that there was only one thing to do—that was to get married. He boldly proposed it. The idea startled Miss Roorke at first and she protested against it. He reasoned with her that they had long been engaged and would have been married before this had it not been for impediments put in their way. After much persuasion she hesitatingly gave her consent. Then they got about every minister in the place out of bed before they found one who would marry them. They called in their coachman as a witness and soon were made man and wife by the Presbyterian minister, Mr. Campbell, whom Reich gave $25 as a fee. Then they went to the hotel and retired with the consciousness of having done the best they could under the circumstances. Since then their parents have forgiven them, and they have been re-married by a priest.

LEFT HIM AT THE ALTAR.

Charles E. Brooks' Child-Wife Sues for a Divorce, and Swears He is After Her Money.

A Baltimore despatch says: Florence R. Winchester, the child-wife of Charles E. Brooks, has applied for a divorce from her boy-husband to whom she was married last March. She alleges that he obtained her consent through fraud and perjury. The license, she says, was procured by her lover swearing he was 21 years old and she 18 years, when in fact he is only 19 years and she 15, and his object in marrying her was to get hold of property which she will inherit when she attains her majority. In describing their courtship the young wife tells how her husband prayed with her and read the Bible, when all the time he was engaged in dishonest and nefarious transactions. By these hypocritical professions and other deceptive means he won her affections. On the day the ceremony was performed they left home under the pretense of going to the theatre. She charges that on the way he suddenly surprised her by suggesting marriage and got her consent. They went to the parsonage. She immediately became conscience-stricken at what she had done. She left him almost at the altar and went to her father's house, where she has remained ever since. Since the marriage she said her deceitful husband on one occasion decoyed her from home and forcibly detained her. She charges that he has cruelly and brutally treated her and robbed her of her jewellery. The young people are well connected, and the case caused a sensation.

Mr. Spurgeon's Next Step.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian writes: "In Nonconformist, and particularly in Baptist circles, growing interest is felt in what will be Mr. Spurgeon's next step. It is an open secret that the instincts of his nature compel him to seek congenial communion, and that he cannot long remain content with his present isolation. No one dreams now of his return to the Baptist Union, and the general impression is that circumstances will compel him shortly to initiate a movement which will result in a sort of federation of Baptist Churches, comprising those who share his views, and which will be tantamount to the formation of a new denomination. A movement of this kind would, in the opinion of some, help forward the suggested union between the Congregational bodies and the Baptists."

Sure Not to See Him.

Mrs. Yeast—Will you give Mr. Bacon a message to his wife if you should see him to-day?

Mr. Yeast—Oh, I won't see him to-day.

"But he may drop into your office."

"No, he will not."

"Why are you so positive about it?"

"I loaned him $5 last Monday, and he promised to pay it to-day."

It is never too late to mend; but a man cannot expect to have a button sewn on much after midnight.

BOUCICAULT'S WIFE WINS.

A New York "Scotch" Marriage Held Valid—She Gets a Divorce at the Playwright's Expense.

A London cable says: The celebrated Boucicault divorce case was decided on Thursday in favor of the wife. In the trial of the case Mrs. Agnes Boucicault, the petitioner, deposed that her maiden name was Robertson, and that she was born at Edinburgh in 1833, was educated for the stage, and that she first appeared at the Princess' Theatre in London, which was then under the management of Charles Kean. She was then introduced to Dion Boucicault, who made her an offer of marriage. Influenced by the advice of Mrs. Kean she declined the offer, but eventually in 1852 went to live with him. Relations continued between them until August, 1853, when she went to America to follow her profession. She had an engagement at Montreal, and while there she received letters from Dion Boucicault, who was at New York. At his request she went there to see him. On her raising some objections to living with him at the hotel, he informed her that if she would consent to become his wife he would consent to become her husband, and by the laws of New York, that, together with living as man and wife under his name, constituted as valid a marriage as in Scotland. Under the circumstances she consented to become his wife, and they stayed at the hotel for a week or ten days, living publicly there as man and wife. After that she was generally looked upon as his wife, and on one occasion at Boston he publicly made an announcement to that effect from the stage. Subsequently she executed a separation deed, under which she was to have an annuity of $4,000 a year. That document was signed in her maiden name, she being forced to do so, being warned that otherwise she would not receive the allowance in question. In 1883 she heard that Boucicault had gone through a ceremony of marriage with a lady in Australia. She commenced a suit for divorce, but abandoned it at the request of her child. Mrs. Boucicault was cross-examined at some length as to the various proceedings she had taken against her husband, and as to the date of the alleged marriage, one of the dates being 1855. His Lordship pointed out that the pleadings appeared to have been amended. No witnesses were called for the defence. The respondent's counsel contended that there was no marriage between them. The judge came to the conclusion that there was a legal marriage between the parties, and granted Mrs. Boucicault a decree nisi by reason of the bigamy of her husband, Dion Boucicault, who, moreover, is mulcted in costs.

HIS BRIDE WAS DEATH.

A Young Man Shoots Himself Because His Wedding Suit Was Not Made in Time.

A last (Friday) night's Boston despatch says: William H. Gibson, a young chemist and electrician, employed by the Boston Electrical Company, shot himself in the temple last night at his rooms, No. 11 Wellington street, because his new wedding suit did not arrive from the tailor's in time for him to attend the ceremony. He was found by his landlady this morning with blood flowing from a pistol shot wound in his head. He was conscious, but could not speak. An ambulance conveyed him to the City Hospital, where he died to-night. For the past two years he has been engaged to Miss Lillian Chandler, the niece of Col. W. H. Long, of Chelsea. Early this week he engaged rooms on Wellington street, telling the landlady that he should bring his bride there to live in a short time. All day Tuesday and Wednesday he was going in and out of the house, seeming very much distressed. Yesterday forenoon he said to a woman of the house: "I expect my wedding suit to arrive at any moment. The tailor promised to have it here Monday. It is not done yet. I must get it right away, for I am to be married to-night and cannot stand up in a business suit." He shook badly and wept while he told the story. The ceremony was to take place at 7 o'clock. As nothing was seen of Gibson after that hour the landlady thought he had obtained his clothes and gone to the wedding. Miss Chandler, the bride-elect, waited with her bridal robes on until after 10 o'clock last night. The guests were assembled, the clergyman in waiting and the wedding banquet spread. At last messengers were sent to Gibson's home, but the servants could tell nothing of his whereabouts. Policemen and messengers scoured the city all night to no effect. Miss Chandler joined in the hunt. About 9 o'clock this morning word was brought to the Chelsea Home that young Gibson was dying at the City Hospital. Miss Chandler and Colonel Long visited him. When he saw them he denied that his name was Gibson, but said he was Charles J. Rice, a clerk employed by Brown, Durrell & Co. Though both Miss Chandler and Colonel Long identified him he refused to acknowledge his name and protested that he never knew any one by the name of Gibson.

This afternoon the suit in which he was to have been married arrived, and he will be buried in it.

A Perpetual Railroad Pass.

A Boston despatch says: A most singular case came before Judge Allen, of the Supreme Court, yesterday for decision. It appears that in 1836, when the Boston & Providence Railroad Company was chartered, Mr. John C. Dodge, of Attleborough, conveyed a portion of his land in consideration that he and his family should ride free over the railroad as long as the land was used for railroad purposes. A granddaughter of Mr. Dodge claims that she is entitled to the privileges named in the deed, and that the word family meant "descendants" of the grantor. The railroad company demurred on the ground that the remedy of the plaintiff, if any, is at law, and not in equity. Judge Allen overruled the demurrer, and expressed an opinion that under the deed the Boston & Providence Railroad Company would be required to carry free the descendants of Mr. Dodge for all time.

She Was Wrong.

"You are entirely too diffuse in your views," remarked Mrs. Squildig to her husband. "It is the man with one idea who succeeds nowadays."

"I don't know about that," replied Squildig, "I think a man with two good optics stands a better chance than a man with one eye, dear."

FARM AND GARDEN.

How to Manure at the Lowest Cost.

One of the heaviest items in manuring the land is the hauling and spreading. This expense cannot be easily avoided, but there are many methods of enriching land that are available, though not always practiced. Where a large amount of produce is sold off the farm the fertilizing elements go with it, and if the fertility of the soil is to be retained something must be brought on the farm to take the place of that which is sold off. No farm will remain fertile unless the plant food necessary for the growing crops is provided, and manure will not retain fertility if it comes from no source but the farm itself, as sooner or later the supply must be exhausted. On stock farms, where large quantities of bran, middlings and ground grain are bought and fed, no difficulty will be experienced, but on farms devoted to the growth of crops, and the crops sold off the farm, the use of artificial fertilizers permits of a return to the soil of the necessary plant food in a concentrated form, the labor of their application being but a small expense. Green manuring is the cheapest mode of enriching land, as no hauling is required. There is considerable labor required in plowing land so treated, but the plowing itself is beneficial, as it reduces the land to a finer condition, and assists in destroying weeds and grasses. No field should remain idle. When one crop comes off another should come in. If the second crop cannot be marketed let it be plowed under for manure. Early potatoes can easily be removed in time for a green manurial crop, such as buckwheat, peas and oats, millet, Hungarian grass or corn. These crops need not grow very high. Under no circumstances should they be allowed to mature seed, even if the season permitted, but should be turned under green, so as to quickly decompose. A large majority of farmers after harvesting their corn leave the field until spring. How much better it would be to plow the field and sow it quickly to rye, turning the rye under in the spring for a potato crop. The plowing of the corn land would decompose large quantities of weeds and grass, as well as corn roots, while the rye so grown, if preferred, can be made to do good service for early grazing by stock in the spring. Other crops may be followed by green manurial crops in like manner, thereby enriching the soil by the decomposition of its own elements, and save hauling to that extent. The manure heap should also be composed of fine material, which will lessen the labor of handling the manure when the time arrives for spreading it on the land.

The Willow a Useful Tree.

There is no tree that is so sure to grow without any care as the willow. A twig from a branch of a tree stuck into the moist earth, and the labor is completed. An article in a German contemporary recommends the cultivation of willow trees, not only from an economical and industrial point of view, but also for hygienic purposes. They are especially useful where the drinking water is taken from fountains or natural wells, and still more where there are morasses and meadows; and in the vicinity of willow trees water is always clear and pure. Let those who doubt this fact place a piece of willow which has not yet begun to strike into a bottle of water, and place this within another bottle containing water only, in a warm room for eight days; in the first bottle will be found shoots and rootlets in clear water, while the other bottle will contain putrefying water. Holland is covered with willows, and the dam works are made stronger by the network formed by the roots.

The Crow as a Farmer.

The crow is nobody's fool. "Live and learn" is his motto; and he does both, especially the former, in a way to excite the admiration of all disinterested observers. In the long struggle between human ingenuity and corvine sagacity, it is doubtful which has thus far obtained the upper hand. Nor have I ever quite convinced myself which of the contestants has the better case. "The crow is a thief," the planter declares; "he should confine himself to a wild diet, or else sow his own garden." "Yes, yes," Corvus makes reply; "but if I steal your corn, you first stole my land." Unlike his cousin, the raven, who, along with the Indian, has retreated before the pale face, the crow is an ultra-conservative. Civilization and modern ideas are not in the least distasteful to him. He has an unfeigned respect for agriculture, and in fact may be said himself to have set up as a gentleman farmer, letting out his land on shares, and seldom failing to get his full half of the crop; and, like the shrewd manager that he is, he insures himself against drought and other mischances by taking his moiety early in the season. As I plant no acres myself, I perhaps find it easier than some of my fellow-citizens to bear with the faults and appreciate the virtues of this sable aboriginal. Long may he live, I say, this true lover of his native land, to try the patience and sharpen the wits of his would-be exterminators.—Bradford Torrey, in the July Atlantic.

Other Agricultural Notes.

An immense radish has been picked by Miss Mary Lambert, of Island Lake, Fla. It weighed four pounds and was six inches in diameter at the largest point. This radish was thirteen inches long in the body proper, while its tap-root was thirteen more, making twenty-six in all.

Prof. J. A. Lintner placed the total number of insect species in the world at 320,000. Of those found in the United States 7,000 or 8,000 are fruit pests, and at least 210 attack the apple.

One advantage in the soiling system is the freedom from weeds in the feed, which with cows at pasture in summer give a better taste to milk and butter. With corn-fodder, millet or other cultivated crops suitable for soiling purposes there is better quality and greater uniformity in the milk product.

Gradually more attention is being paid to grass for the reason that by growing it and taking pains in the management the fertility of the soil can be gradually improved more so than with almost any other crop. And as the yield of other crops begins to fall below the line of profitable yields more attention is paid to grass.

A New York farmer states that he used only coal-gas tar to prevent the ravages of the potato beetle. He puts a gallon of tar in a tub, over which he pours boiling water, which is allowed to settle and cool. This is sprinkled over the vines with an ordinary sprinkler. A gallon of tar costing 75 cents suffices for several acres of potatoes.

An "Indiana Farmer" correspondent advocates the use of rocks and stones for mulching newly planted trees, and where at hand they are superior for the purpose. Their pressure keeps the soil close to the roots and the roots in place, while they retain moisture, choke down weeds and preserve a more even temperature than a mulch of litter does.

The Home and Farm gives the following novel method of making cabbage head. It says that "when the plants are about eight inches high, and have formed woody stalks, make incisions in the stalks with the small blade of a penknife, insert small pieces of wood of the size of a match, and break them off. This checks the growth, and hard heads will be formed."

A cleanly kept cow will yield sweet milk with an agreeable, sweet odor, and quite free from any taint or injurious quality whatever, says Hoard's Dairyman. That such milk is very rare is simply because such cows are rare, and this is the reason why the very best purely flavored butter is rare, too. The cow that produces only 100 pounds of butter per annum is not to blame for the disgraceful fact—it is the stupid farmer, who either doesn't feed her or make a merciful use of the butcher-knife.

A Girl Abbess.

London St. James' Gazette: The Archduchess Marguerita Sophie, daughter of Archduke Charles Louis, has been installed at Prague as abbess of the community of Noble Ladies of the Hradskin. The installation was effected with great pomp in the Church of St. George, a large number of officials and knights of the imperial orders being present. The new abbess, who was robed in black, with an ermine mantel, was formally presented with the insignia of her dignity, a staff and ring. The Hradschin is the capitol of Prague, and this community, to which it gives its name, is a retreat for unmarried ladies of noble family. It was formed under Maria Theresa. The inmates, it is stated, are not subject to the ordinary vows or rules, and are even permitted to marry. The present Queen Regent of Spain was abbess there from 1876 to the time of her marriage. The new abbess is 18 years old.

Hats of Great Men.

"'Seven' being the average size of a man's head as measured by his hat," says a London exchange, "it appears that out of fourteen distinguished personages, two (Lord Chelmsford and Dean Stanley) were below, while other two (Lord Beaconsfield and the Prince of Wales) were exactly up to the average. Of the others, Dickens, Selborne and Bright required 7⅛, Earl Russell 7¼, Lord Macaulay, Gladstone and Thackeray 7⅜, Louis Philippe 7⅝, and the Archbishop of York 8 full. Of twenty-three distinguished men whose actual brain weights are known, four, including the late Prof. Hughes Bennet and Hermann, the philologist, were distinctly below the average, showing that a well constituted brain of small dimensions may be capable of doing much better work than many a larger organ whose internal constitution is, from one cause or other, defective."

A Widow's Revenge on a Railroad.

The Savannah News says: A railroad running through Emanuel county recently killed a razor-back hog belonging to a widow, and she entered a suit for damages for the value of it. The railroad won the case, it being shown that the proper signals were blown and the precautions taken, and the plaintiff was sorely distressed about the result. She had converted the pig into lard, and as the road would not pay for killing him, she bestowed what remained of the porker on the company. On a dark night she took the pot of grease, and proceeding to the track of the company, coated the rails with a liberal daub of grease for about a quarter of a mile. It took all the sand that the engines could bring to bear on the track for two days to tide over the spot which crippled traffic. Now the widow is threatened with a law suit.

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

The Influence Which Dress Has on the Morals.

LATEST FASHION GOSSIP.

(Cousin Kate's Weekly Contribution.)

The True Wife.

Let a woman be sure that she is precious to her husband—not useful, valuable, convenient simply, but lovely and beloved: let her be the recipient of his polite and hearty attentions; let her feel that her love and care are noticed, appreciated and returned; let her opinions be asked, her approval sought and her views respected in matters of which she is cognizant; in short, let her only be loved, honored and cherished in fulfilment of the marriage vow, and she will be to her husband, and her children and society a well-spring of pleasure. She will bear pain, toil and anxiety, for her husband's love is to her the tower of a fortress. Shielded and sheltered therein, adversity will have lost its sting. She may suffer, but sympathy will dull the edge of her sorrow. A house with love in it—and by love we mean love expressed in words and deeds, for we have not one spark of faith in love that never crops out—is to a house without love as a person to a machine. The one is life, the other mechanism. The unlovely woman may have bread just as light, a house just as tidy as the other, but the other has a spring of beauty about her, a joyousness, an aggressive and penetrating and pervading brightness to which the former is a stranger. She gleams all over with it. It is airy, and gay, and graceful, and warm and welcoming with her presence. She is full of devices and plots and sweet surprises for her husband and family. She has never done with the romance and poetry of life. She is herself a lyric poem, setting herself to all pure and gracious melodies. Humble household ways and duties have for her a golden significance. The prize makes the calling higher, and the end dignifies the means. Her home is a paradise, for "love is heaven, and heaven is love." Always man needs woman for his friend. He needs her clear vision, her subtler insight, her softer thought, her winged soul, her pure and tender heart. Always woman needs man to be her friend. She needs the vigor of his purpose, the ardor of his will, the calmer judgement his braver force of action, his reverence and his devotion.

Dress and Morals.

I noticed in Sunday's Constitution an article by Henry Labouchere upon the dress of our grandmothers and its relation to morals. The editor of the London Truth asserts that our grandmothers, in their stiff stays and powdered hair, didn't have a chance to be indecorous. Hasn't Mr. Labouchere lived long enough to know that the moral or physical stiffness of a person's environment tends toward a desire to break bounds? Madame Pompadour wore the stiffest stays, the highest heeled shoes and the greatest quantity of powdered hair of any woman in history, and yet how long will it take humanity to learn that dress and manners are entirely apart, and that human nature is the same in mother hubbards or panniers? There are about an equal number of good and bad people in each generation, regardless of fashions or surroundings. The cry against low evening gowns rages regularly every winter. We see it written that our grandmothers never wore frocks as shockingly low as the women of to-day. There's a book, published many years ago, called "The Republican Court." It contains copies of the portraits of all the famous and beautiful women in the time of George Washington. The dresses of more than half the women are shockingly low—the lowest of the lot being that of Mrs. James Madison. The age makes no difference. There are always styles that can be abused and made common if the wearer chooses.—M. B., in Atlantic Constitution.

A Charming Advertisement.

Those physical wrecks of men who pace wearily up and down Broadway with placards at their front and backs, and familiarly called sandwich men, are not the only persons who promenade as advertisements. Comelier advertisers are several girls sent out by leading milliner and dressmaking establishments. They are models chosen for perfection of face and figure, clothed in the newest and most pronounced costumes of bonnets, and then sent out to walk in Broadway and Fifth avenue. The girls selected for this particular service are those who have been for several years used in their employer's store as models on which to show off goods to wealthy purchasers, and thus have become known to those customers so well that on being seen in the streets they are instantly recognized. Thus the freshest wares offered for sale in those shops are announced under the most favorable circumstances.—New York Sun.

Fashion Fancies.

At a grand ball in Paris Viscomtesse de Conevat wore flowered silver lampas made a la Henry Deux, with slashed sleeves and all, and over it her pearls, the most famous in Europe, beginning in a dog-collar about the breast and spreading row after row till they drooped far below the waist.

Wonderful are some of the trimmings on the best evening dresses, such as white or cream crepe lisse, embroidered with pearls, the embroidery in silk of tender tints. Paste diamonds are introduced into some of the galloons, intermixed with pearls, silk and tinsel threads.

In spring and summer fashions a host of details are borrowed from gentlemen's dress. There are narrow and flowing cravats, both plain and colored; plaited shirt-fronts, tiny jeweled studs, scarf-pins, and linked buttons for throat and sleeves, with a close high corsage. A lace frill, very closely gathered, is worn, this copied from the masculine toilet of a former epoch.

An evening gown had a combination of colors so exquisitely blended as to deserve comment. The petticoat, of pale pink coral satin, brocaded with silver and gold, was partially draped with the same shade of crepe de chine; the bright chestnut-brown velvet train was lined with eau de Nil satin, and trimmed down one side, across the back and up to the left shoulder, with the richest raised Spanish point, fastened with bows of the blended colors. With other amalgamated shades the result is equally artistic and successful.

A writer in the Atlantic, in seeking to assist parents in finding names for their children, urges them to avoid odd or eccentric or poetic combinations and be guided by euphonic quality only. Helen Campbell, in a letter to the Kansas City Journal, says the shop girls of that city are not allowed to sit because the fashionable women don't like it. "What is the next pleasure?" is the way the girls ask if anything else is wanted. The law which does not allow girls under 18 to work over twelve hours is not obeyed. Every girl must have a waist of from 18 to 20 inches. The floor-walkers are cruel fellows, often fining girls for spite. Some of the girls make 84 cents a week, and the highest wages are about 18 shillings. The girls club together, huddling in small back rooms, and spending all that can be saved on dress. Naturally, unless with exceptionally keen consciences, they find what is called "sin" an easier fact than starvation.

Terrors of a Volcano.

Some idea of the terror of volcanoes may be gathered from an account of one in one of the Hawaiian Islands recently published. When the crater was filled from 500 to 600 feet deep with molten lava, the immense weight of which broke through a subterranean passage of twenty-seven miles and reached the sea, forty miles distant, in two days, flowing for three weeks and heating the water twenty miles distant:

"Rocks melted like wax in its path; forests crackled and blazed before its fervent heat: the works of man were to it but as a scroll in the flames. Imagine Niagara's stream, above the brink of the Falls, with its dashing, whirling, madly-raging waters, hurrying on to their plunge, instantaneously converted into a fire; a gory-hued river of fused minerals; volumes of hissing steam arising; smoke curling upward from ten thousand vents, which gave utterance to the many deep-toned mutterings and sullen, confined clamorings; gases detonating and shrieking as they burst from their hot prison-house; the heavens lurid with flame; the atmosphere dark and oppressive; the horizon murky with vapors, and gleaming with the reflected contest. * * * Such was the scene as the fiery cataract, leaping a precipice of fifty feet, poured its flood upon the ocean. The old line of coast, a mass of compact indurated lava, whitened, cracked and fell. The waters recoiled and sent forth a tempest of spray; they foamed and dashed around and over the melted rock; they boiled with the heat, and the roar of the conflicting agencies grew fiercer and louder. The reports of the exploding gases were distinctly heard twenty-five miles distant, and were likened to a whole broadside of heavy artillery. Streaks of the intensest light glanced like lightning in all directions; the outskirts of the burning lava as it fell, cooled by the shock, were shivered into millions of fragments and scattered by the strong wind in sparkling showers far into the country. * * * * Six weeks later at the base of the hills the water continued scalding hot and sent forth steam at every wash of the waves."

A Beggar with a Full Pocket.

"I am deaf and dumb; can you give me work at anything? I have to support myself and have no money," was found in type-writing in one pocket of a mute beggar arrested at Third and Race streets yesterday by Detective Almendinger, and in the other pockets was found $569.65. Paper and pencil were given the mute and he wrote his name as William Darlington, of Toronto, Canada. It was also learned that he saved his money for twelve months at a time and then visited Dublin, Ireland, and deposited it. He was locked up at the Central Police Station. — Philadelphia Record.

JELLIES OF JULY.

Timely Suggestions for the Industrious Housekeeper.

Early in July the good housekeeper begins to think of her jelly and jam. It is a great mistake to put off making currant jelly till the end of the season, for the best jelly is made of currants not perfectly ripe. Those used for preserves should be fully ripe. To keep a light color in jelly, care should be taken not to cook the sugar long, as this will darken the fruit and cause it to "candy." Some persons are very successful in making currant jelly by merely heating the sugar in the oven, and, after the juice has boiled twenty minutes, adding the sugar and leaving it over the fire only until the sugar is thoroughly dissolved. This makes the jelly of a beautiful color and delicate flavor, but it is not usually so firm as that made by the common method of boiling twenty minutes before, and ten after, the sugar is added. Do not "skimp" your sugar. A pound to a pint is the only safe rule.

The best jelly-bag is made of new flannel. Take a square of flannel and fold it to make a double three-cornered piece; sew up one side; this leaves a large opening by which to put in the fruit, and the juice will all run to the point, the weight of the fruit pressing it out. Do not squeeze the bag. Very little juice can be gained in that way, and what is will be of an inferior quality. It will not pay for the labor.

Currant and apple jellies are the easiest to make, as they are surest to be firm. Apple juice will help to harden jellies that incline to be thin. Much of the jelly in the market is made from apple stock, with flavoring of various kinds to justify the labels attached. It would be well if nothing more harmful were ever used.

A delicious raspberry jelly may be made by using one quart of currants to a pint of raspberries. Pick over the fruit, leaving the currants on the stem, but taking out all leaves. Mash the currants and put them over the fire to scald, then pour them hot into a bag. Take the juice that runs out at once and pour over the raspberries. Scald this and put it into another bag. Let both hang over night. In the morning measure the juice, putting currant and raspberry together, and weigh a pound of sugar to each pint of juice. Boil the juice well before putting the sugar in; it must boil twenty minutes at least. Add the sugar and let boil twenty minutes longer; skim carefully, if the juice does not look clear the white of an egg may be added.

Crab-apples make a very firm and palatable jelly. The Siberian crab-apples are easily obtained and are fine in flavor, but, if one can get them, the wild crab-apples (the sour, green things that grow on thorny trees in the country) give the greatest satisfaction. They have a spicy flavor and a pleasant acid which are particularly delightful to invalids. The juice of the crab-apple, of either kind, may be used for jelly with that of other fruits, such as peach, raspberry or cherry, and will give firmness without injuring the flavor. The proportion may be left to the taste of the jelly maker.

Quince jelly is easily made from the parings and odd pieces of fruit left after preserving, but it is not well to leave the seeds in, as they tend to make the jelly sticky and ropy. Grape jelly should be made before the grapes turn. A good old cook-book says: "In making jelly, do but little at a time to keep it of a light color and crisp and firm. Bright, fair weather improves the color and flavor of jelly."

It is well to have a variety—not too much of one kind—of both jellies and preserves, for the palate soon tires of even a pleasant flavor, and the housekeeper's shelves may present a picture to delight the eye by a careful and artistic arrangement of the various colors and shades.

Jellies should stand open a day or two after being put into glasses, that the moisture may evaporate, but they should be protected from dust. If thin, let them stand in the sun's rays. In a day or two cut papers to fit the glasses; dip these in brandy, alcohol or white of egg, and press them closely on top of the jelly. A very old-fashioned method is to pour melted butter or clean mutton fat on top, and let it harden. All jellies and preserves should be so covered, then if mold appears it can easily be removed without wasting the fruit. Finally put on the glasses the covers made for that purpose, or cover with paper, pasting the edges down.

It is impossible to give more than general rules as to the best place for keeping fruit. Jellies and preserves will bear a warmer place than canned fruit; but each housekeeper must decide by experience as to the best place in her own house. It should be a dry, dark place, where the fruit can be easily watched.

To make raspberry jam, weigh equal proportions of fruit and sugar, put the fruit in a preserving kettle, with a little currant juice, one pint to six quarts of berries, mash the berries as they cook, using a silver or wooden spoon. Let it cook well before adding the sugar, after which boil ten or fifteen minutes.

While raspberries are in season no one should fail to make raspberry shrub, to use for a summer drink. Pick over black raspberries; if they need washing put them in a sieve and let water run through them, the less the better. Let them stand over night in a stone jar, covered with good cider vinegar. Next morning mash them well and strain them through a bag, not your jelly bag, as the vinegar will injure it; measure the juice and add three-quarters of a pound of sugar to each pint; boil ten minutes and bottle while hot. For use, put a spoonful or two in a glass of water. This is one of the most useful preparations that can be kept in a house, not only as affording the most refreshing beverage, but being of singular efficacy in complaints of the chest.

Gooseberries which comes in July make very good preserves, but are better spiced according to the following famous recipe: Six quarts of gooseberries, nine pounds of sugar. Cook one hour and a half, then add a pint of vinegar, one tablespoonful each of cloves, cinnamon and allspice; boil a little longer. When cold they should be solid; if not, boil them again. The little green gooseberries are the best.—Good Housekeeping.

DIGGING FOR CAPT. KIDD'S GOLD.

Startling Stories of Buried Treasure Which Worry Fortune Hunters.

News comes that a party of men have organized to dig for gold in a small cave near Greenfield, Conn. It is not known there is any gold in the cave. Some years ago a report was started that gold was hidden in the cave—probably a part of the mysterious wealth that Capt. Kidd buried—and on several occasions spades and pick-axes have been brought into play, the work generally being done in the night time. A year or so ago a number of men visited this cave night after night, excavating dirt, which they drew up in baskets and threw out of the mouth of the cave. They finally withdrew, leaving their tools behind them, but whether they carried away any treasure is not known. The members of the party just formed evidently think their predecessors did not take it all.

Over in New Jersey there is a rise of ground called Money Hill, on the bank of the Shark River. Money Hill got its name from an early belief that Capt. Kidd made it a bank of deposit. In fact, it is quite certain that he did. A good many people have dug into Money Hill; a few years ago two sailors came there, dug a hole and went away again. "It is said" they left a rusty iron box by the side of the hole, and that some ancient coins were found near the water side, where they re-entered their boat. That was a fever flesh and blood could not resist. The entire neighborhood was aroused, and Money Hill and the whole north bank of the Shark River was prodded with spades. But no more iron boxes filled with ancient coins were found. But did that settle the matter? Not at all. Last month the disease broke out again, as virulent as ever, and a number of men went to work to unearth treasure from the sides of Money Hill. If they discovered any chests of Spanish dollars they kept the matter secret.

A search is now going on for an immense lot of private treasure buried on Turneffe Cays, off British Honduras. John B. Peck, a former journalist of Washington, is the man who leads in the enterprise. A few weeks ago he came into possession of information that pointed to the sinking of a small pirate vessel, just filled with gold, on Turneffe, which is a coral key. Peck obtained a concession to dig for the millions, agreeing to pay the Government 10 per cent. of all the treasure he found. Since then he has made two expeditions to the spot, on one of which his ship was wrecked, and on the other he broke his tools and returned to this country for more. He has succeeded in getting people to put up money for the expenses of these adventures, they to be repaid out of the buried gold—when it is got. This Peck left New York for the trip early last month.

Two years ago a resident of Nantucket was digging in his cellar for water, but he missed that, as did Dow (of Dow's Flat), and struck gold instead, or said that he did. It was an iron chest filled with Spanish doubloons. The entire island was in a blaze of excitement, and many, if not all, the cellars in the place were dug over, though no more iron chests were upheaved, nor did any Spanish doubloons clink on the laborers' steel blades. About the same time a digger was industriously upheaving the soil on a point of Mount Desert in the belief that Capt. Kidd had strayed that far north to hide the vast accumulation of gold and silver that he had taken from the treasure-ships of all nations, that is, all nations that had treasure-ships.

This bloody old piratical Englishman, who was finally legally put to death for his crimes, has led many men on fools' errands. For 100 years people have been digging at different points between Delaware Bay and Rhode Island in search of buried treasure. The labor expended in this direction would, at $1 a day, buy all the gold and silver and goods and ships that Capt. Kidd ever stole. It is a mere superstition that he ever buried anything. The $20,000 in gold and silver he carried into Boston was probably all he could command, for the hangman's noose was already dangling just above his head, and he would naturally do whatever he could to propitiate the Government—the English authorities in those days not being adverse to taking money from any source.—Rochester (N. Y.) Union.

The Salvation Army in India.

One of the strangest developments of modern religious fervor is the Salvation army in India. This remarkable organization, which may be disliked, but which is not to be despised anywhere, has taken a form in India entirely adapted to the native sentiment and imagination. Its European members dress in Indian costume and walk barefoot—a terrible thing to do on the burning soil. They submit to privations which the native fakir can hardly surpass, and live on an average of about twenty cents a week. They have drawn into their ranks Commissioner Tucker, an English official, who has resigned a yearly salary of $4,000 to follow them, and who marches dressed in the wretched attire of a fakir, but under a red canopy carried by four Salvationists. These missionaries address the natives in their own language. At Madras lately they had a great demonstration and preached in their characteristic style to an attentive audience of natives. Perhaps this is the best way for Christianity to get at the dull and debased myriads of India after all.—Boston Transcript.

STRANGE VOICE FROM A WRECK.

Singular Story of a Waterlogged Vessel Discovered in the China Sea.

"You see, messmates," says the old quartermaster, as he seated himself comfortably again, "in a seafaring life we meet with many rough jobs that are out of all ordinary calkillation, and what them as haven't been to sea wouldn't hardly believe. There was that ship we fell in with in the China Sea—that was an odd thing that was.

"It was only just after daylight in the morning watch as some one sung out, 'Sail ahead.' But it wasn't much of a sail, for there was only one mast—the foremast—standing, but a big ship agoing steady afore the wind, with her foretopsail set, but not hauled taut, but all flapping like. Well, we see as there was no one aboard, or, if so be there was, they didn't know how to manage her. So when we'd run down a little ahead of her, we lowered a boat, and I was one of the boat's crew, as went aboard, and as we pulled up to her, we could see nobody on deck, but only heered a dog barking; and when we went up the side, sure enough there was a half-starved dog a-sitting upon the body of a man; and when he sees us he sets up a dreadful howling, but still he didn't seem displeased to see us, but threw back his ears, though he looked dreadful melancholy and down in the mouth. But the curious thing was to see the number of rats that was running about the decks, for the ship was waterlogged, and the rats were driven from below and obliged to shift for themselves.

"Well, there were three more dead bodies lying about; and when we came to look at them the rats had ate most of their faces and necks and ripped open their jackets to get at their flesh elsewhere, but the corpse as the dog was sitting on they hadn't been able to touch; for you see the rats they lived upon the dead bodies, and the dog lived upon the rats—so we supposed by the carcasses of one on 'em as was lying near him. And such rats as they were I never see—a'most as big as half-grown rabbits, and so tame that they didn't make no account of us. You see they'd been so familiar with the bodies aboard that they looked upon us as so many sheep or cattle, or what not, as was come aboard for their live stock.

"Well, we tried to get into the cabin, but this was full of water, and so was everything below decks; and there was no name upon the stern, or we couldn't make it out where the ship was from or where bound; and we searched the captain's pockets, but couldn't find no memorandum nor name, only a love letter sewed up in a piece of oil-skin in his jacket, and signed "Sarah." And when we was thenking what was best to be done, whether to throw the bodies overboard or what, a voice, as seemed close to us, sung out in a curious low tone, more like a female's than a man's, 'Ship ahoy, there! what ship is that?'

"Well, that startled us a'most out of our senses; for we couldn't see nothing, and the bodies on deck was dead we knew by reason their faces was eat; and says one of the men, 'It must be the dog,' says he, 'he've been a-thinking over to hisself all he've heerd, and have been and taught hisself to speak;' and says he to the dog, answering his hail like, 'The Zenobia, 600 tons, John Shum, master, of and from London, bound from Singapore, with a general cargo.' But the dog made no answer to that, and while he was a wondering what it could be, the same kind of a voice sung out again: "Steward, glass of grog!" Well, now we knew as this couldn't be the dog, because they don't take no grog. Then says another man: 'I'm much deceived if that 'ere voice don't come out of the mainmast;' so we goes to the mainmast that is, the stump of it—and out of the middle of the ropes and halyards that was hanging about the pins the voice comes out again and says: 'Oh, sweet Polly! No higher, keep her rap full.'

Well, we soon cast off the ropes, and what should we see but a fine gray parrot a setting in a kind of nest she'd made and looking as if there wasn't nothing the matter with her!

Well, we hove over the dead bodies and left the rats to feed upon themselves, but we brought off the parrot and the dog, though he wouldn't leave the body till we'd taken the jacket off and laid it down in the boat for him, and then he came willin' enough; and Capt. Shum took the dog and bird and brought them home to his old woman, and perhaps they're both alive now."—Boston Commercial Bulletin.

Terrible Work of the French Rifle.

According to the accounts the new "Lebel rifle" is a wondrous weapon, and is destined to do terrible things in the hands of French soldiers. The members of the Academy of Medicine, wishing to diagnose the physical consequences of wounds inflicted by the bullets of the gun, recently had experiments made on twenty corpses, probably those of paupers whom nobody owned, or those off ill-fated waifs picked up at the morgue. The bodies were placed at the ordinary firing distances, from 200 yards up to a mile or so. The bullets whizzed through the bones and pierced them without fracturing them, as is done by the bullets of the "Gras rifle." The wounds, if they may be called so, which were inflicted, were small in their punctures, and consequently very dangerous and difficult to heal. Injuries inflicted at short distances were so considerable that, in the opinion of the surgeons, they would be almost incurable. At the longest range—2,000 meters—a poplar tree was hit, but the bullet did not go through the tree. At 1,200 meters the tree was pierced through and through. The discharges of the rifle are unaccompanied by smoke, and the reports are comparatively feeble.—London Telegraph.

THE CHRONIC GROWLER.

The chronic growler, whose portrait we have endeavored to sketch above, (from imagination of course) is to be found in nearly every community. He is forever sneering at this, growling at that, and bewailing the sad condition of things in general. Not one word of praise ever falls from his lips, not one grateful thought ever wells up from his cankered soul or emanates from his diseased intellect for the innumerable benefits conferred upon him, in connection with his fellow-mortals, by a gracious and beneficent Creator. He views the beauties of nature unmoved; the majestic beauty of the starry host touches no sympathetic chord in his bosom. In short, he is constantly looking at pictures on the reverse side. He dwells in the deep darkness like the bat and vampire. He sows the seeds of dissention and strife here and there. His mission seems to be one of eternal malevolence towards everything animate and inanimate. He growls when the weather is hot, and wonders what on earth the country is coming to anyway. He snarls when it is cold, and wishes himself in a warmer climate. If the minister preaches a lengthy sermon, he is a crank and tedious old fogy; if the sermon be short, the preacher is lazy and don't earn his salary. If the speaker is earnestly vigorous, he is a fanatic; if he is quiet and dignified, he is a long-faced, dry old chip. And so on through the whole lengthy chapter.

Reader! many people are not chronic growlers, but some of them have acquired the bad habit of senseless fault-finding in this or in that particular, as the case may be. If allowed to develop, the habit soon becomes chronic. Stop it! It distorts the features, stultifies the intellect, and o'ershadows the soul with the dense gloom of spiritual midnight. "The face is the index of the mind," and just so with the Chronic Growler. The woebegone countenance, with the corners of the mouth pointing earthward, are but the reflections of what is within. Everything within and without or which emanates from the pessimist has a degrading downward tendency. Cultivate a cheerful, happy disposition; mingle only with those of a similar disposition; be true to your Creator and yourself, and you will pass through life with infimtely more of sunshine and less of shadow than the Chronic Growler, while your reward will be greater beyond.

The Mt. Forest Representative is vexed because somebody wrote in a kindly manner about the Editor of THE ADVANCE in the editorial columns of this paper. The Rep. calls it "bad taste." It so happened that the article in question was left with our manager pro tem, and put in type before we returned home from our holiday trip; so that we had no knowledge of it until a few hours before going to press. The Rep. will pardon us for saying that it exhibits, in speaking as it does, not only wretched taste but a positive ignorance of the gist of the article complained of, which was of a decidedly critical character, although written in a friendly vein. What most degrades rural newspaperdom is the hap hazard style of criticism adopted by some of its representatives, who frequently rush into print when they are actually ignorant of the subject they have the sublime gall to presume to write about.

From our own Correspondent.

The garden party held on the school grounds on Friday evening the 30th ult., was a most decided success. The evening was warm and pleasant, being just such as young men and maidens like for a drive. There was a large turnout and all parties expressed themselves as being well pleased with the entertainment. The Flesherton Brass Band rendered some choice selections of music. There was also singing and music by the school children. The proceeds amounted to about $25.00.

The Sabbath School picnic was held in Mr. W. Buchanan's bush on the 3rd inst. and was very well attended. The day was fine and the children enjoyed themselves accordingly.

The Meaford Road and Ninth Line base ball clubs played a second game here on the 3rd inst., which resulted in a victory for the home team, the score being, Meaford Road 21, Ninth Line 4.

On Wednesday evening, 4th inst., Mr. David L. Devons, of King, was united in wedlock to Miss Minnie Mary C. Hutchinson, daughter of Mr. Wm. Hutchinson, Postmaster of Vandeleur. Grand Excursion.

A grand excursion, under the auspices of the Workmen and Forester Lodges, of Shelburne, will be ran to Lewiston (State of New York), and Niagara Falls, on Thursday, July 26th, 1888. Tickets will be issued for the round trip from stations, at rates as follows:

	TO LEWISTON.	NIAGARA FALLS.
Markdale, Flesherton	$1 90	$2 40
Proton, Dundalk, Corbetton	$1 75	$2 25
Melancthon, Shelburne, Crumbies, Laurel, Orangeville Junc., Orangeville	$1 00	$2 00

The excursion will leave by regular morning train. Those taking Lewiston tickets will return same day by special train, leaving Toronto at 9:30 o'clock p. m. Tickets to Niagara Falls are good for three days. The trip to Lewiston will be made by the magnificent new steel steamer, the "Cibola," leaving Toronto at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, arriving at Lewiston at 4:30, and leaving at 5:25, reaching Toronto at 8 p.m. Excursionists to Niagara Falls arrive there by New York Central Railway from Lewiston at 6:30 p.m., and can return by any regular train or boat to Toronto on Friday or Saturday morning, thence home by regular C. P. R. train. There is a service between Niagara Falls and Toronto, three times a day, leaving the Falls at 7:25 a.m., 9,40 a.m., and 4;55 p.m. For particulars see posters.

To most children, the bare suggestion of a dose of castor oil is nauseating. When physic is necessary for the little ones, use Ayer's Cathartic Pills. They are safe and pleasant to take. Try them.

Correspondence of The Advance.

Mrs. John Benson and Miss Rose Carr took the train on Saturday morning to Owen Sound, where they paid a visit to an old friend and neighbor, Mrs. Heron, and saw the sights of the town. Tuesday morning following they returned home much pleased and refreshed with their trip.

Martyrs to Headache

Seek relief in vain, until they begin to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Then they regret the years of suffering they might have escaped had they tried this remedy earlier. The trouble was constitutional not local; and, until Ayer's Sarsaparilla did its effective work as an Alterative and Blood Purifier, they were compelled to suffer.

The wife of Samuel Page, 21 Austin st., Lowell, Mass., was, for a long time, subject to severe headaches, the result of stomach and liver disorders. A perfect cure has been effected by Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Frank Roberts, 727 Washington st., Boston, says that he formerly had terrible headaches, and until he took Ayer's Sarsaparilla, never found any medicine that would give Permanent Relief.

"Every Spring, for years," writes Lizzie W. DeVeau, 262 Fifteenth st., Brooklyn, N. Y., "I have had intolerable headaches. I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla last March, and have not had a headache since that time."

"I suffered from headache, indigestion, and debility, and was hardly able to drag myself about the house," writes Mrs. M. M. Lewis, of A st., Lowell, Mass. "Ayer's Sarsaparilla has worked a marvelous change in my case. I now feel strong and well as ever."

Jonas Garman, Esq., of Lykins, Pa., writes: "For years I have suffered dreadfully, every Spring, from headache, caused by impurity of the blood and biliousness. It seemed for days and weeks that my head would split open. Nothing relieved me till I took Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has cured me completely."

When Mrs. Genevra Belanger, of 24 Bridge st., Springfield, Mass., began to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, she had suffered for some years from a serious affection of the kidneys. Every Spring, also, she was afflicted with headache, loss of appetite, and indigestion. A friend persuaded her to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which benefited her wonderfully. Her health is now perfect. Martyrs to headache should try

The White Cross Society.

APPEAL FOR THE EXTENSION OF THE WORK.

The White Cross society took its rise in a meeting held at Bishop Auckland, under the Presidency of the Bishop of Durham, on February 14th, 1883, at which Miss Ellice Hopkins bore a prominent part

To Objects of the Society are threefold:—

1. To urge upon men the obligation of personal purity.

2. To raise the tone of public opinion upon questions of morality.

3. To inculcate a chivalrous respect for womanhood.

The policy of the Society is especially to influence young men of all classes, and in all conditions of life—boys at school, undergraduates at the universities, clerks in business houses, soldiers and sailors, artizans, labourers in the country villages, &c.

It will thus be seen that the work of the Society is definitely educational.

The method of the Society has been from the beginning not so much to create new machinery for the special work, as to utilize that which is already existing—Temperance Societies, Guilds, Bible Classes, and similar agencies.

The spread of the White Cross Society within such organizations as the Y. M. C. A., Young Men's Friendly Society, the Church of England Young Mens' Society, the Church of Scotland Young Mens' Guild, &c., is strongly recommended.

The diffusion of healthy literature, setting forth a high ideal of manliness, has been systematically undertaken, and more than a million of the White Cross Series have been circulated. Grants of papers for distribution has been freely made. Upwards of five thousand were given away during a general mission recently held in a large manufacturing city.

The five White Cross Obligations have been accepted as the connecting link which binds together Societies in England, Scotland, Ireland, Canada, the United States, Australia, India, Japan and other parts of the world. Thus the spread of the same principals is secured outside our own country, and a vast moral federation is becoming an accomplished fact.

The working expenses of the Society have been defrayed up to this time by a few warm liberal friends, who provided the necessary funds for three years. The period for which provision is already made is fast approaching its termination, and it is necessary to look forward to the future.

The work is rapidly increasing, but it is estimated that for the next few years a sum of £600 a year will suffice; and appeal is earnestly made for Contributions, securing without delay this annual income.

It is, however, thought advisable that an effort should be made to obviate the necessity of annual appeals for subscriptions by raising an Endowment Fund of (say) £20.000, which, invested, would place the Society beyond risk of pecuniary embarrassment. The Earl Aberdeen, Lord Herschell, Lord Kennaird, and Sir. T. Fowell Buxton, have consented to act as Trustees of this Fund.

Donations and Subscriptions may be sent to the Bishop of Durham, Auckland Castle, Bishop Auckland; The Lord Kinnaird, 1, Pall Mall East, London; G. S. S. Vidal, Esq., Bouverie & Co., 1, Pall Mall East, London.

J. B. CUNELM,
President.

Auckland Castle, Bishop Auckland.

Dr. T. T. W. Reynolds, Hamilton, Ont., has kindly consented to receive Local Subscriptions and Donations, and forward them to Lord Kinnaird (Treasurer of the Fund).

The White Cross degree in connection with Fountain council R. T. of T. will hold their meetings on the first Wednesday in each month in their lodge room Sproule's block Flesherton.

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.,

Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:

My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.

Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,

C. EDWARDS LESTER.

What I Know.

I know the summer's day is sweet,
I know that Love is sweeter still,
know that bliss is ne'er complete,
I know of no perpetual ill.
I know that life has many sides—
That some things here seem hardly meet;
I know that baseness often rides
While Virtue walks with wearied feet.
Yet often want and wealth, I know,
But for each other's mask have stood,
And men, I know, where'er we go,
Are mostly happy when they're good.
I know that Life, upon the whole,
Is well worth all we have to give,
And that the grander is the goal
So much the grander 'tis to live.
I know that Death is very nigh—
That evil shrinks before his breath;
That only goodness gives "good-bye"
A rain-bow in the cloud of Death.

Chicks and Children.

"Don't count your chickens before they are hatched,"
Is a maxim that's ancient and hoary,
To which there's a deal of importance attached
Which may not be seen in my story.
For chickens sometimes will come out of their shells
And start independently crowing,
And when prematurely a chicken's head swells
You may guess 'tis presumptuous growing.

But our children at present resemble the chicks,
From the cradle they get prematurely,
And urchins of seven with grown-up men mix
And puff cigarettes quite demurely.
While girls in short dresses, of tenderest years,
An old-fashioned parent would sicken,
For the womanish manner they put on appears
Like the hen's place assumed by the chicken.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

The day wore on slowly; the snow fell heavily at intervals in great soft white flakes which covered the ground and lay there, blotting out all paths, and making the face of the surrounding country a pure white waste, over which it would be soon difficult to find one's way. The stillness in the little sitting-room grew intense and almost oppressive; the fire blazed up brightly, and Shirley lifted Jip on to her lap; it was pleasant to feel the warmth and life of the little animal in this complete stillness. Her thoughts had wandered away back to the past, to that happy Christmas-day at Fairholme Court when she was engaged to Guy, and all her life lay before her, cloudless and serene, lighted by the sunshine of the love she had won. Hugh had been there also—poor, hapless Hugh, who had loved her with that love which had been so fatal to them all, that love which had blighted her life and Guy's and his own.

Then she recalled other Christmas-days spent at Glynn and in London, stately ceremonious feasts which had wearied her excessively; and the day of the preceding year—that awful Christmas-day which she had spent alone in London, fearing discovery and detention, an unhappy fugitive from love and peace and rest.

Well, if it were to be done again, she would do it; it had been for the best. What did her sufferings matter if he were happy with the sweet young girl who loved him and whom he loved? She could go away and drift out of Madge's life as she had drifted out of Lucie's and Ruby's, and out of the lives of all who loved her. As soon as the fine spring days came she would go away and seek another shelter.

Sitting before her cheerful fire, leaning back in the low-cushioned chair, a thought struck her: she would write to Jack—she would tell him all, everything, without reserve, and ask him to advise her what to do. Perhaps he might even come home and fetch her. Dear Jack! He was well off now; his sojourn in India and the industry and steadiness he had displayed had won him a junior partnership in the firm; and when she had last heard from him, just before Sir Hugh's death—she could not call it murder, even to herself—he was a wealthy man, and he had spoken of coming home soon. Had he returned? she wondered. Perhaps not. Perhaps, if she addressed a letter to him at Calcutta, it would reach him; for she could not recall his address. Dear Jack, who had never known the truth about her marriage! There had been no necessity to burden him with the knowledge that it was through him that such misery had fallen upon her: but he should know all now, and he would take her away somewhere perhaps where she could be quiet and at peace until the end came.

She put the little dog gently from her lap and rose from her seat; the afternoon was wearing on, but the dazzling whiteness of the snow prevented it from being dark as it generally was at that hour. Besides, the cheerful blaze of the fire lit up the little room, playing odd tricks with the shadows on the walls, and peering into far corners, as if to discover any lurking intruder. Opening a little escritoire on the right-hand side of the fire, Shirley took out writing-materials and placed them on the table; then she trimmed and lighted the lamp, and moved over to the window to draw the curtain.

As she did so, she drew back, with a little stifled cry of terror, and covered her face with her hands, for, pressed against the pane of glass, a face had looked in upon her—a face with wild haggard eyes—a face which had disappeared immediately when the eyes met hers.

For a few minutes Shirley stood with her eyes covered, physically unable to move in her terror, her heart beating furiously, her breath coming in quick gasps; then, when she mastered courage to remove her hands, there was nothing visible but the window and the white road and the fields beyond.

Had she been deceived? Was it but the force of her imagination, excited by her loneliness and the excessive stillness, which worked upon her nerves? Had she really seen a face—that face—looking at her through the shielding glass, or was it there only a vision that she had conjured out of her excited fancy? Were her nerves giving way? Was her brain getting confused? Was she going mad?

She staggered toward the window and forced herself to look out; but there was nothing in sight, save the snow which had fallen previously and a few slow heavy flakes which were beginning to fall; the little dog, however, was running about restlessly and barking excitedly, as if he too had seen something which had aroused his suspicion or his alarm. In an agony of terror Shirley dragged the curtains over the window—she dared not open it to close the shutters which were outside—and crept back to her chair, trembling with a terror which had taken all color from her face and lips and strength from her limbs.

"Jip, come here!" she whispered, as she cowered over the fire, feeling an icy thrill of horror which made her shiver from head to foot, but Jip, although he paused for a moment in his restless running to and fro, resumed it almost immediately, his uneasiness adding greatly to the terror the poor woman was enduring. "Jip—oh, Jip!" she said pitifully, in a voice hardly above a whisper, for her lips were shaking with terror. "Come here, Jip!"

But Jip, for once, was deaf to his mistress' voice; he was flying about the room, scratching impatiently at the door, barking furiously and sniffing vigorously, and showing other signs of discomposure and perturbation of spirit. Something forced Shirley to open the door into the little passage for him; he flew out, barking furiously and excitedly at the outer door—the door which Shirley had bolted so securely.

Was it again the force of her imagination acting upon her senses, or did she really hear a sound, as if some one were stealthily trying the door from the outside? Surely the handle moved! And, in an agony of mortal terror, Shirley fled back into the sitting-room, covering her face with her hands to shut out sight and sound.

How long she knelt there with her head buried in her hands she never knew; but an hour at least must have passed, for the fire which had been just built up before the alarm came was a glowing red mass. For some time Jip had continued his barking; but when she lifted her head he was no longer in the room. Trembling still she rose to her feet. All was quiet; there was not a sound to break the stillness, the silence which seemed so awful now to the terrified woman in her loneliness. She went to the window and drew back the curtains; but the snow was falling heavily, and she could see nothing. She closed the curtains and came back shivering, when a little moaning sound from Jip startled her; he was lying just beside the outer door, and, as he saw Shirley, he looked up at her appealingly with a pitiful little whine, turning his eyes to the door the next minute, as if entreating her to open it.

Srirley hesitated and shrunk back. Was any one there? she wondered fearfully. Was it some one who needed help? Ought she to open it? Or was it all the effect of her excited imagination, her fancy which had seemed to look at her through the window? Since that was of necessity—for the dead do not come back—a delusion of her senses, the noise outside must have been also. Who would want to rob her? she thought, with a little smile. What a silly, fearful coward she was growing! Nerving herself for a desperate effort, she opened the door, and Jip sprang out joyfully.

The snow was falling heavily, and some great, heavy flakes were carried into the little passage. Shirley shrunk back a little, then went forward bravely. As she crossed the threshold of the door, her foot struck against something lying there, and she bent down anxiously.

The snow, falling so heavily over the road and hedges, had fallen also on the prostrate figure stretched senseless outside her door, and Jip was scratching vigorously at the snow trying to disinter it. With an exclamation of pity and compassion and dread, Shirley tried to distinguish who it was; but it was too dark. She guessed that it was a man who lay there, and that he was sorely in need of her assistance. Bending down, she spoke to him and tried to rouse him; but it was in vain. He lay like a log, senseless and stupified; and it was only with the greatest difficulty and with an immense exertion of strength that she succeeded in dragging him into the passage, Jip following with little, satisfied demonstrations of joy. Then, having laid him down, she turned and once more bolted the door behind her, leaning against it, panting and breathless from her exertion.

After a minute or two, she recovered sufficiently to bend over the man whom she had succored. There was not light enough in the passage to distinguish his features, but she felt that his heart beat, feebly indeed, but perceptibly; and she took courage. Once more she lifted him by the shoulders and dragged him into the sitting-room, leaving him there for a moment while she ran for pillows, on which she raised his head. As she did so his hair fell back from his forehead, disclosing the face upturned and senseless.

Merciful Heaven, whose face was that? Was it another delusion, or was it— The next moment a shrill cry of terror rang through the quiet house.

CHAPTER XLII.

The Christmas holidays were over, and the village school had begun again. Mrs. Grant was looking rather worn and haggard; but the cold weather tried her, she said; and she was even more patient than was her wont with the girls, who were not improved by their holidays or rendered more willing to work. It was a very weary face which bent over the desk when the children had departed one afternoon and Shirley was alone. She was busy counting up the marks, for Lady Oliphant was to give some prizes, the distribution of which had been postponed on account of the absence of the squire and his daughter.

Some singular change had taken place in Shirley during the past few days. It was not merely that she was paler and sadder even than usual, but there was a strange nervousness about her manner, an uncertainty, an indecision, a shrinking, which were very different from her former quiet ease of manner, which had always been so remarkable. Any sudddn noise seemed to startle her. She rarely left the house, except during the time she was teaching; and she had dismissed the little maid who had attended upon her, employing her only for an hour or two in the morning to go down to the village to get the necessary supplies.

These changes had not failed to strike the inhabitants of Erindale, and much curiosity had been felt about the dismissal of little Jane Austen, whose bright, helpful way had always made her a favorite with Shirley. That she had no fault to find with the child was evident from the kindness of her manner toward her; and Mrs. Austen, on paying the school-mistress a visit, had received an assurance that Jane was a very good girl and a useful little maid; and Shirley had no better reason to give for her dismissal than that she was going to try to do without any help for a little time. Mrs. Austen had gone away shaking her head and prophesying that Mrs. Grant would make herself ill with the work.

The school closed at 3 o'clock during the winter months, so that it was still daylight when the children trooped away, shouting and laughing, delighted to leave off lessons and to take to sliding and snow-balling—for the snow was still resting on the hills and the weather was bitterly cold.

They were in the very thick of a snow-balling match, flushed and excited, when Madge Oliphant appeared coming up the hill, and the snow-balling ceased, while the rosy faces were turned toward Madge with a smile of welcome.

"Well, girls, are you having a good time of it?" she said, in her bright sweet voice, "You are making plenty of noise; and I am sure it is not fair that poor Mrs. Grant should have your noise out of school-hours as well as in! Suppose you go down to the next field and continue operations there; and, if any one tries to stop you, you can say that I gave you leave."

They trooped off, carrying their shouts and laughter into a field on the right-hand side of the hollow, and Madge walked on and entered the school-house, the bright eyes softening into tenderness and compassion as she saw the slender bowed figure leaning over the desk. As she entered, Shirley looked up with a start, and into the beautiful hazel eyes came a startled look of fear, which faded as she saw who the intruder was; and Madge came toward her, looking so bright and sweet in her sealskin and furs that the bare, empty-looking room was brightened by her presence.

"Miss Oliphant, I did not know you had returned," Shirley said as she rose to meet her; and Madge took her hands, and looked wistfully into her face.

"We came home last night," she said gently, as she lifted her sweet lips to meet Shirley's kiss. "And how have you been? How pale you are!"

"Am I? But I am always pale, you know. Have you enjoyed yourself, my child? Have you had a pleasant visit?"

"Very pleasant," said Madge, gayly, the color deepening a little in her face. "I will tell you all about it presently. I am going to have tea with you. Why," she added suddenly, as Shirley began hurriedly to gather her papers together, stooping over them to hide her expression from Madge, "are you not pleased to see me? You naughty girl! I have been looking forward so ardently to a chat with you."

"I am pleased to see you, of course," Shirley said hurriedly. "What could make you suppose otherwise?"

"Your face," said Madge quietly. "You look as if my proposal had startled you. Have you not enough tea in the house?" she added laughingly.

"I daresay there is enough to make you a cup," Shirley answered, forcing a smile. "Shall we go in, Miss Oliphant? It is cold here; the fire has gone out."

"And your poor little hands are frozen," said Miss Oliphant, chafing them tenderly between her own; then, putting her arm round Shirley, with a caressing gesture, she added softly, "have you had any fresh trouble during my absence, dear?"

Shirley started.

"No, no," she answered hurriedly. "What makes you think so?"

"Your face again," Madge said, smiling. "It is a very tell-tale one, and it was not so pale as this when I saw it last, and there were not those heavy marks under your eyes which are there now."

"You have been seeing such rosy faces during your absence," Mrs. Grant answered, forcing a little laugh, "that it is no wonder you think mine pale. En revanche," she added, "I have never seen you looking so well and bright, dear."

Madge laughed, colored, and put up both hands to her face with a charming gesture of shyness and hesitation; then she slipped her gloved hand through Shirley's arm, and they went into the cottage together. The fire was burning cheerily in the little sitting-room, but the room did not look so pleasant and home-like as usual; it had a strange, unfamiliar look to Madge Oliphant's eyes as she glanced round her. None of the books were out of their places, the piano was closed, the pile of music all in order; there was no work on the table, no pretty, picturesque litter anywhere.

"Won't you take off your coat?" Shirley said nervously. "You had better do so, or you will not feel the good of it when you go out again."

Madge acquiesced; and then Shirley talked loud and fast and nervously, and moved restlessly about the room in a purposeless kind of way which Madge could not help observing.

"Papa is coming for me on his way from Adinbrock," she said, trying to assume her usual cheerful manner. "I had such a lot to say to you that I did not want to be hurried away before it was dusk. Why, Jip, old man, where have you been—upstairs? Are you glad to see me?" she added, smiling—"gladder than that naughty mistress of yours is?"

"He could not be that," Shirley put in, in a low voice of pain; and Madge, with a quick repentance, put her arms round her.

"Forgive me," she said coaxingly. "That was a naughty speech; but I am so glad to see you, dear Mrs. Grant, that it hurt me to think you are not equally pleased to see me."

"You know that I am glad," Shirley answered, gently disengaging herself. "Sit down by the fire, Miss Oliphant, while I see about tea."

"'Miss Oliphant' again," Madge said, pettishly; "and I have so often begged you to call me Madge!"

"I am afraid I cannot please you to-day," Shirley said, with a smile, as she glanced over at the pretty dissatisfied face on which the firelight fell.

"You always please me," Madge said quickly. "But why are you so very dignified to-day?" she added, with a little laugh. "I am almost afraid of you—you keep me at such a distance."

"You fancy I do; but, dear, between the village school-mistress and Sir Frederic Oliphant's daughter there is a wide difference."

Shirley passed into the little kitchen, beyond, coming back presently with the tea-kettle, which she placed on the fire; then she began to prepare the table for tea, going about it with a quiet grace which made the homely occupation a very pretty sight in Madge's eyes.

"Where is Janie?" she asked presently; and Shirley's face was turned away, or Madge would have seen how the color rose to it at the question.

"I have sent her home. I prefer being without her," she answered.

"Without her!" echoed Madge. "But you surely do not intend to remain here alone all night?"

"Do you think that Jane would be a great protection?" Shirley asked smiling slightly.

"No; but it would not be so lonely for you, and she was very useful. Did she displease you?"

"Oh, no!"

"Then why did you send her away?"

"Because I preferred to be alone."

Her tone was very gentle, but very firm, and there was a short silence, during which Shirley busied herself making the tea and Miss Oliphant sat looking into the fire, with a puzzled wistful expression in her blue eyes.

When the tea was made and covered with the pretty cozy, Shirley begged to be excused for a moment; and Madge heard her run lightly up the stairs, although she closed the door carefully after her when she went out. She was not absent many minutes; but, when she returned, it seemed to Madge that there was an added shade of sadness on her face.

"Where is Jip?" Madge asked lightly.

"He stayed upstairs," was the quiet answer. "No, don't call him, dear; he—he—he is so restless, he makes me nervous."

She went to the table as she spoke and began to pour out the tea; and, as she handed Madge a cup, she forced a smile to her lips.

"And now tell me all about this delightful visit," she said cheerfully, "I am on tenter-hooks of curiosity, Madge, to know what made it so very pleasant."

"Have you caught cold?" Madge asked, looking at her keenly.

"Caught cold? No. Why?"

"Because your voice sounded rather husky, and when you were upstairs you had a terrific fit of coughing."

All the color died out of Shirley's face; and she rose hastily, going to the fire to put some more water in the little teapot.

"Did you hear me?" she said unsteadily; "I had no idea I could cough so loud."

"You coughed dreadfully. I wish you would see Dr. Lloyd. You look anything but well. Will you let me send him up on my way home?"

There was a slight hesitation; and then Shirley said lightly:

"I will think about it. Come, Madge, tell me about your gayeties. Is Cotsford a nice place?"

"Yes, the house is very quaint and old and charming—not quite so large as Stuartleigh, but quite as ancient."

"Stuartleigh?" Shirley repeated mechanically.

"Yes," Madge said quietly, sipping her tea—"Major Stuart's place. We drove over there; it is only a few miles from Cotsford—three or four."

"But I thought—I thought—Major Stuart was abroad!"

"You thought wrong," Madge said, with a bright laugh and a hot blush. "He came back a fortnight ago, and he and a friend are at Stuartleigh. Poor Guy!" she added sorrowfully, a sudden shadow falling upon the brightness of her face.

"Why—is he ill?"

"Ill? Oh, no! He is much stronger than he was last winter; but—Ah, well, some day I will tell you all his story; and you will see whether there is not some excuse for the depression under which he labors sometimes."

All his story! Did any one in all the wide world—did Madge herself—know that story as Shirley knew it? she wondered.

"And we coaxed Guy and his friend Mr. Ross over to Cotsford," Madge continued, looking at the fire, her cheeks flushing a little as she spoke. "And I'm sure it did them—What is the matter? Are you faint?"

She put down her cup hastily and went to Shirley's side, for she was drooping over the table in a helpless manner which alarmed her guest.

"It is nothing," she said. "I am very sorry I startled you, Madge; but it is nothing indeed. You were saying you induced Major Stuart and—"

"Are you really better? Mrs. Grant, I shall insist on your seeing Dr. Lloyd," Madge said, as she went back to her seat.

"Dr. Lloyd cannot do anything for that sudden faintness, dear; it is an old enemy. Well, Madge, are you not going to tell me all your doings?"

"I am so afraid of tiring you."

"Tiring me! I am longing to hear," And the pale face wore an expression of eagerness add anxiety which made Madge smile.

"You are a regular daughter of Eve!" she cried delightedly. "I am charmed to have discovered a failing at last in this little perfect woman about whom all Erindale is raving. Our dear model school-mistress is curious."

"Very curious," Shirley acknowledged, with a forced smile. "Gratify my curiosity, Madgie."

"Madgie!" How pleasant it is to hear you call me that!" the girl said, smiling, as she drew up a stool to Shirley and sat down at her feet. "Well, revenons a nos moutons—nos moutons being Major Stuart and Mr. Ross.

"Mr. Ross!" Shirley repeated, her heart beating wildly.

"Yes, a friend of Guy's from India," Madge said, a little shyly. "How hot the fire is!" she added. "It is scorching my face."

Shirley put both hands gently on the flushed cheeks; Madge pulled them down to her lips and kissed them softly.

"Did you like Mr. Ross, Madgie?"

"He was very nice."

"Is he handsome?"

"Yes, very handsome."

"And did you like him, Madgie?" Shirley persisted gently.

"I—I do not know."

The words were very shyly and sweetly spoken; and Shirley wondered a little at the tremor in the girl's voice.

"Is Mr. Ross going to remain in England?" she said persistently.

"For the present—yes; he and Guy are coming to Erindale next week for a few days."

Coming to Erindale! It seemed as if Shirley's heart stood still with terror at the very thought. Coming to Erindale! It was well that Madge Oliphant was too much occupied with her own thoughts to look up at the white stricken face leaning back against the chair.

"Papa took such a fancy to Mr. Ross," went on Madge's sweet, unconscious voice—"he liked him so much that he is quite pleased at the thought of a visit from him; and you will see him too," she continued softly, "for we have talked about our model 'school-marm' until they are both quite anxious to see her."

To see her! What new, terrible complication was this. Shirley felt faint and dazed and giddy.

"They are coming in a few days," Miss Oliphant went on. "And I shall bring them to see Mrs. Grant, of course. But I should like her to be looking somewhat—" She broke off suddenly and lifted her head with a little gesture which commanded attention. "Why," she exclaimed excitedly, "surely there is some one upstairs! I am certain I heard some one cough."

"It must be Jip, then," Mrs. Grant said, sitting up in her chair, quite composed now. "You forget that he is upstairs."

"Jip could not cough," Madge said dubiously—"and it was a cough I heard, I am sure."

"Jip often makes a growling noise which might easily be taken for a cough. Who else could be up there, Madge?"

"No one, of course, without you knowing it—unless some one might have concealed themselves there to startle you or even do you an injury."

"You absurd child! It would have to be a very small individual who could conceal himself or herself in either of those little attics. Why, I am up and down there constantly, and I could not fail to see any one who was there! Besides," she added earnestly, anxious to remove the idea from the young girl's mind, "Jip is such a good watch-dog, you know, that if any one were there who did not belong to the house, he would never cease barking until he had the matter seen into."

"I don't think it is right for you to be here alone at night," said Madge, decidedly. "You might be ill. No one knows what might happen."

"I am afraid Jane would not have been of much assistance if I had been taken ill, for it required all my strength to wake her up in the morning," said Mrs. Grant, with an attempt at laughter.

"Then you must have some one more efficient. I will speak to mamma about it."

There was a moment's silence; then Shirley said gently—

"I am sure you do not want to pain me, Madge. I prefer being here alone. I do not want any assistance. Should I need it, dear, I will promise you to obtain it if you, in your turn, will promise me to say no more about it. And also I entreat of you not to mention it to Lady Oliphant at all."

"Why not?"

"Because—because—well, call it a whim if you like, and gratify it."

"I suppose I must when you ask it with that look in your eyes. Ah, there is papa," she added, as Sir Frederic's knock sounded at the door.

They went together to the door, where Sir Frederic was waiting for his daughter. He lifted his hat courteously to Shirley, but did not offer her his hand.

"Good-afternoon, Mrs. Grant. Fine, seasonable weather, is it not? Well, Madcap, are you ready?"

"Yes, papa," Madge answered, fastening her sealskin coat. "I am coming. Where have you left the trap?"

"At the foot of the hill," he answered. "I have one or two places to go to yet; but I thought Mrs. Grant would have enough of your chatter by this time. Have I come too soon?"

"I was in no hurry," said Madge lightly; but she parted with Shirley with less reluctance than usual, and she was very silent as she went down the hill with her father, who fancied that her attention was occupied in picking her steps over the road, and thought no more of her unusual silence and abstraction.

They did not start homeward for fully half an hour, for the squire had two or three people to see in the village; and it was quite evening when they turned toward home. They had to drive through the village, and, to Madge Oliphant's surprise, as they passed the Oliphant Arms, a slim figure in black closely veiled, issued from the public-house and walked rapidly away up the hill toward the school-house. Madge uttered a half stifled exclamation as she turned her head to look after her—something in the graceful walk and rather haughty carriage had reminded her of Mrs. Grant; but the next moment she laughed the idea to scorn. Was it likely that Mrs. Grant would be at the Oliphant Arms at that time, or at any other? And yet the thought that it was she haunted her, although they were almost home before she put it into words.

"Papa," she said, trying to speak carelessly, "did you see a woman dressed in black come out of the Oliphant Arms?"

"Yes, my dear."

"You saw her? I wonder if the same thought struck you which struck me. I thought her something like Mrs. Grant."

"It was Mrs. Grant, Madge," said Sir Frederic quietly.

When They were Famous.

When George Eliot began her career as a novelist she was 37 years old.

Thackeray achieved eminence by writing the novel, "Vanity Fair," at the age of 35.

Trollope and Charles Reade, both now recognized writers, didn't attain note till almost in the noon-day of life.

The beautiful writer, Hawthorne, was 46 years old when he became famous as the author of the novel "Scarlet Letter."

Dickens, an exception to the rule, was a noted novelist at the age of 22, but he was reared in the heart of London's poverty and bitterness, and he wrote from real life.

He Has More Time for It.

"Henry, dear," said a fond wife, "I am afraid your brother Daniel plays the fool more than he used to." "Well, yes," replied her husband, "I guess he does. You see the days are growing longer."—Burdette.

A Serious Humorist.

My story is a sad one, and won't take long to tell
To any sort of metre I can suit it just as well.
You'll understand my misery before the tale is done,
It all began one hapless day—the day I made pun;
And ever since that fatal hour the people do declare
That I became a humorist, alas! right then and there;
Though to be considered serious I'd give a lot of money,
Whatever I may say or do, they will insist it's funny.

I might perhaps have since escaped the direful consequences
Had I not penned a feeble joke when hardly in my senses.
'Twas printed in a paper of tremendous circulation,
And I was dubbed a humorist by all the laughing nation.
In vain I tried to prove myself a libelled individual,
The fatal truth confronted me—the joke was quite original.
Where'er I went there followed me that dreadful reputation,
And every word I spoke aroused uproarious cachinnation.

If I remarked in casual tones upon the gloomy weather,
The people laughed until they cried, and laughed and cried together;
When I gave information of some accident distressing,
They roared with mighty merriment exceedingly depressing;
And when I failed in business, and despairing told my wife,
She, laughing, vow'd I'd never been so funny in my life!
I dressed in sombre black, assumed a grim, funereal air,
And spoke in wee-enveloped tones, my face distraught with care.

I wept a little when I could, all steep'd in melancholy,
But people only laughed again, and whispered, "Ain't he jolly!"
In fact, the more that I became a sacrifice to sadness,
The more I met the wretched glee that drove me near to madness.
Full half my time is spent declining pressing invitations
To humorous banquets and to write for comic publications,
And scented notes and letters couched in words as sweet as honey—
"Now won't you send your autograph? and please to make it funny."

If I should sink beneath my trials, and leave this mortal sphere,
The world would give me credit for the best joke of the year;
And doubtless folks who came to gaze upon my monument
Would find it quite impossible to keep their laughter pent.
'Tis useless to deny it now, alack! the mischief's done,
And I must be a humorist, tho' an unconscious one.
I've only this request to make, which no one can resist:
Please call me in my epitaph the Serious Humorist.

THE BLACK WATCH.

Death of Sir Duncan Cameron, the Veteran Colonel of the Regiment.

General Sir Duncan Alexander Cameron, G.C. B., died at Blackheath on Thursday last. This distinguished officer was born in the year 1808, and the date of his first commission was 1825. He became captain in 1833, major in 1839, colonel in 1854 and major-general in 1859, and finally won the full rank of general after nearly fifty years of service. He was placed on the retired list in 1873. He served with distinction throughout the war in the Crimea, where he was in command of the 42nd Highlanders (the Black Watch) at the battle of the Alma, and commanded the Highland Brigade at the battle of Balaclava. He was further engaged in the expedition to Kertch and at the seige of Sebastopol, and in the assault on the Redan of the 18th of June. For his services he was mentioned in despatches and received the medal with three clasps, as well as many foreign distinctions. He was made an officer of the Legion of Honor, and received also the Sardinian and Turkish medals and the 3rd class of the Medjidie. At the end of the war he received his C. B. In the New Zealand war, 1863-65, he was in command of the forces and conducted the operations at Kolikara, Kohasoa, Trangiriri, the Gate Pah and other battles. For these services he was again mentioned in despatches, gained the medal, received the thanks of the Legislative Council of the colony, and was promoted to K. C. B. Sir Duncan Cameron was made colonel of his old regiment, the Black Watch, in 1863, and he was Governor of the Military College at Sandhurst from 1868 to 1875. In 1873, on his attaining the rank of general, he was promoted to be G. C. B. Sir Duncan married in 1873 Flora, daughter of Dr. Andrew Maclean; she died in 1875.—London Times, June 12th.

For and About Women.

Madame Andre, the portrait painter, has given all her jewels, valued at $20,000, to the Paris Philanthropic Society.

Pundita Ramabal has already secured about $50,000 toward the fund she is raising to establish a school in India for Hindoo widows.

Miss Linda Gilbert has devoted 15 years and most of her fortune to prison reform. She has established 22 libraries in the prisons of different States, and found employment for 6,000 ex-convicts.

In Calcutta, a society of native young men for promoting the marriage of girl widows has been formed. Another has existed for some time, whose members promise not to marry little girls, nor themselves to marry so early as has been the custom.

A number of ladies in Philadelphia get their bonnets very cheaply by having a clever milliner out of employment come to the house. They pay her $5 a day, and in one day she trims up the bonnets and hats for all the women in the family.

Here is a reflection from the Reflector: How women can manage to sit bolt upright and not change a position, looking neither to the right nor left, during a sermon in church passes the understanding. A man will sit on the picket fence all the afternoon to see a ball match, but put him in a church pew for three-quarters of an hour and he will wobble all over the seat.

A Well-Founded Report.

Miss Ethel (confidentially)—Do you know, Clara, that I had two offers of marriage last week?

Miss Clara (with enthusiasm)—Oh, I am delighted, dear! Then the report is really true that your uncle left you his money.

There is $25,000 in New York awaiting the order of John Anthony Barnes, who left Boston in 1868 and has not since been heard from.

HOW TO BLEACH THE HAIR.

Only One Way, and That a Poisonous One, to Obtain Golden Locks.

It is difficult to stem any story in which champagne is introduced, says the New York Graphic. There is a sparkle in the looks of the word, an easy sense of opulence in its sound that wins its way into the most truth-guarded columns of a newspaper. One of the most beguiling of these champagne stories is that women use it for bleaching their hair. It reappears with the periodical recurrence of the sea serpent. The thought of lovely woman floating her locks in a bottle of champagne is always too much for the susceptible youth who works the scissors, and in it goes. Now, the fact is that not even a boarding-school girl would divert champagne from its natural uses to this end. The experiment in the first place is too costly, in the second place women are like creatures to ourselves. They would rather drink it. However, a number of different hair-dressers have been interviewed on the subject. The result of these investigations must be painful to the exchange reader and his fervid imaginings. One and all agree that there is no authority for saying that champagne will bleach the hair. The effervescent quality of champagne might lighten the hair a little, as will acids, but something further is required. Naturally each hairdresser is ready to produce that something further. This is in every case a colorless liquid. At one place it is called, we will say, "Dawn;" in another "Liquide d'Or." At a third it appears as under some musical and beguiling syllable, meaning nothing. In every case it is assured that this magical colorless liquid is the only thing that will bleach the hair without destroying it. There are also other preparations, to which a good deal of care has been given to providing them with musical names, to turn hair red, chestnut and other desired tints. In each case the question was plumply asked, "Do you know anything about peroxide of hydrogen?"

"Yes, it will bleach the hair, but it is a powerful acid and will ruin it. Now the 'Dawn' (or the 'Liquide d'Or' or the 'Aureole,' as the case might be) has been analyzed and is medically pure."

To settle all these conflicting claims and testimony an attempt was made to interview Mr. Charles Meyers, the theatrical wig-maker. Mr. Meyers had gone to Europe, but he had left in his place an able assistant, who was dealing out face powder of different tints with a small scoop to waiting customers.

As he was busy he was laconic, but his brief words carried conviction of their truthfulness.

"What do you use to bleach hair?"

"Peroxide of hydrogen, with ammonia added to make it stronger."

"How does it bleach the hair?"

"It is a powerful acid, and bleaches by burning the hair."

"Doesn't that injure the hair?"

"Certainly—ruins it."

"Why do you do it, then?"

"People want it."

"Will nothing else bleach the hair?"

"Nothing."

"What, then, is 'Dawn?'"

"Peroxide of hydrogen."

"What is 'Liquide d'Or?'"

"Peroxide of hydrogen."

"What is 'Aureole?'"

"Peroxide of hydrogen."

"What does peroxide of hydrogen look like?"

"Water."

There seemed to be nothing more to be asked on that subject.

Some face powder was bought as emollient for the young man, and while he was scooping and boxing a few more questions were ventured:

"What will turn hair chestnut?"

"Peroxide of hydrogen."

"Then what will turn it red?

"Peroxide of hydrogen."

He laid down the box of powder, took up 25 cents in exchange, put it in the till, then folded his arms on the counter, leaned on them, and thus delivered himself:

"There are but two things you can do with hair. You can bleach it and you can dry it. If we should put a dozen pieces of hair that looked alike in a bath of peroxide of hydrogen they would come out—more likely than not—all different. It would be owing to the different color tendency of the hair which the oily pigment hides. One might be chestnut, another red, another gold and another flax. That's all there is of it."

"Yes, very well, thank you, sir. But, please," calling this back from the door, "do you suppose that borax or bicarbonate of soda would bleach the hair?"

The young man struggled with his feelings and then answered suavely:

"You can keep your hair clean with borax and soda, and while keeping it clean allow its natural color to show. But in thus drying out all the natural oils you injure the soft and silky texture of the hair, which is a great part of its beauty. Good morning. Not at all."

Land of Fire.

In Terre del Fuego, as a sea captain tells a San Francisco Examiner reporter, a sheep or a baby is considered a fair equivalent for a plug of tobacco or a bunch of matches. If the choice of the price be given he will always give the baby, as there is a much greater demand for sheep than for young Fuegans. * * * Though the Fuegans are very low in the human scale, they are careful not to offend the eyes of strangers. An explorer approaching a boat sees only the best-looking squaw of the party. She handles a paddle at the stern and steers the boat. Her less comely sister—there are always two families on a boat—is hidden ignominiously under the seats.

It has generally been believed that the reduction in average height of French soldiers which followed Napoleon's wars, due, of course, to the immense slaughter in those campaigns, made all of those soldiers the shortest in Europe. But, according to a high medical and military authority in Russia, the minimum height of the Russian and the French conscript is about equal—five feet; while in most other European countries the minimum ranges from five feet one inch to five feet three inches.

She—And do you really think you would be happy with me as your wife? He—Oh, I am sure I have always been a lucky fellow in games of chance.

$500 WILL PAY FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS

THE PROPRIETORS OF Dr. SAGE'S CATARRH REMEDY

For a case of Catarrh in the Head which they cannot cure.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS 50 CENTS. The Only Guaranteed Cure

[COPYRIGHT, 1887.]

CATARRH IN THE HEAD.

SYMPTOMS OF THE DISEASE.—Dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; the eyes are weak; there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; the voice is changed and has a "nasal twang"; the breath is offensive; smell and taste impaired; there is a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility. Only a few of the above-named symptoms are likely to be present in any one case. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated by physicians.

COMMON SENSE TREATMENT. If you would remove an evil, strike at its root. As the predisposing or real cause of catarrh is, in the majority of cases, some weakness, impurity, or otherwise faulty condition of the system, in attempting to cure the disease our chief aim must be directed to the removal of that cause. The more we see of this odious disease, and we treat successfully thousands of cases annually at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, the more do we realize the importance of combining with the use of a local, soothing and healing application, a thorough and persistent internal use of blood-cleansing and tonic medicines.

CHIEF RELIANCE. In curing catarrh and all the various diseases with which it is so frequently complicated, as throat, bronchial, and lung diseases, weak stomach, catarrhal deafness, weak or inflamed eyes, impure blood, scrofulous and other taints, the wonderful powers and virtues of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cannot be too strongly extolled. It has a specific effect upon the lining mucous membranes of the nasal and other air-passages, promoting the natural secretion of their follicles and glands, thereby softening the diseased and thickened membrane, and restoring it to its natural, thin, delicate, moist, healthy condition. As a blood-purifier, it is unsurpassed. As those diseases which complicate catarrh are diseases of the lining mucous membranes, or of the blood, it will readily be seen why this medicine is so well calculated to cure them.

LOCAL AGENT. As a local application for healing the diseased condition in the head, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy is beyond all comparison the best preparation ever invented. It is mild and pleasant to use, producing no smarting or pain, and containing no strong, irritating, or caustic drug, or other poison. This Remedy is a powerful antiseptic, and speedily destroys all bad smell which accompanies so many cases of catarrh, thus affording great comfort to those who suffer from this disease.

PERMANENT CURES. The Golden Medical Discovery is the natural "helpmate" of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It not only cleanses, purifies, regulates, and builds up the system to a healthy standard, and conquers throat, bronchial, and lung complications, when any such exist, but, from its specific effects upon the lining membrane of the nasal passages, it aids materially in restoring the diseased, thickened, or ulcerated membrane to a healthy condition, and thus eradicates the disease. When a cure is effected in this manner it is permanent.

Both Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy are sold by druggists the world over. Discovery $1.00, six bottles for $5.00. Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy 50 cents; half-dozen bottles $2.50.

A complete Treatise on Catarrh, giving valuable hints as to clothing, diet, and other matters of importance, will be mailed, post-paid to any address, on receipt of a 2-cent postage stamp.

WASHED IN HUMAN BLOOD.

The Ceremonies with Which an Ashantee King's Birthday is Celebrated.

When an Ashantee King dies a human sacrifice of 200 victims a week is offered for three months. A King's mother died in 1816 and her son slaughtered 3,000 people, 2,000 being persons just captured from the Fantis. To make up the tale every big Ashantee town had to give 100 and every small town ten victims.

A royal burial is a horrible spectacle. At the bottom of a huge grave are laid the heads of the slain. On them the coffin rests. Then just before the earth is thrown in one of the bystanders—a freeman, if of some rank so much the better—is suddenly clubbed, and a gash made in the back of his neck, and he is rolled in upon the coffin. The idea is to send along with the crowd of slaves and prisoners some one who shall look after them as a ghostly "major domo," says a writer in "All the Year Round."

"For a King there remains yet another "custom." At the end of thirty moons the grave is opened, the royal bones fastened together with gold wire and the skeleton placed in a long building divided into cells, the doorways to which are hung with silk curtains.

Then on his birthday the King of Ashantee goes early to the house of the royal dead.

Every skeleton is taken from its richly ornamented coffin, where it has lain surrounded by the things that had been most pleasing to it in life, and is placed on a chair to welcome the visitor.

As the King enters each cell with a meat and drink offering to the departed, the band plays the favorite melodies of that particular King, and unawares the royal visitor signs to the executioners who have followed him, and an attendant is pierced through the cheeks and killed, the King washing the skeleton in the warm blood.

The same work goes on at the next cell, and so on, the fearful work going on far into the night.

The band plays a signal as each victim is slaughtered. Two blasts on the horn mean "Death, death;" three drum taps, "Cut it off;" one beat from a big drum, "The head has fallen."

The signal is taken up by other bands, and all through the city horn-blowing and drum-beating goes on unceasingly.

He Thought He Could.

Her Parent—Do you think, Mr. Filkins, that you can support my daughter in the style to which she is accustomed?

Bright Young Man—I think I could if you would let us board with you.

TWO FUNNY BLUNDERS.

Illustrating the Danger of Using English Acquired from Books.

A couple of instances of the amusing blunders foreigners may make in speaking English were given me the other day, and I have every reason both to believe them genuine and that they have not before been printed. A lady who had learned English in a school in Europe, where she was accounted remarkably proficient in our language, came to this country to take charge of an establishment. Brought face to face with the practical requirements of every-day life, her English proved less comprehensive and accurate than might have been wished, and the evidences that her vocabulary had been painfully collected from a dictionary rather than from living speech gave a good deal of amusement to those around her. On one occasion she wished to direct a servant to kill a chicken, and after plucking it to bring her the feathers. The form which her direction took was: "Die me that beast and bring me his vestment."

Perplexing as the servant must have found this order, his astonishment can hardly have been equal to that of a carpenter to whom was addressed a still more amusing blunder by this lady. She had an interview with him in reference to some alterations she thought of undertaking in her dwelling, but found the estimates he made so large that she determined not to have the work undertaken. In a short time, however, she found herself so incommoded by the state of the house that she decided that it would be necessary to have the alterations made, even at the figure named by the carpenter. She accordingly sent for him, and once more carefully explained what she wished to have done. To her surprise the man promptly named a price for the work which was considerably in advance of his previous estimate, and his feelings may be imagined when in her consternation her peculiar English betrayed her into saying: "Why, sir, you are dearer to me than when we were first engaged." If the carpenter appreciated a joke he should have scaled down his figures. —Boston Letter in Providence Journal.

Their Ages.

A coincidence occurs in the ages of the Presidential and Vice-Presidential nominees, in that both Thurman and Morton are older than Cleveland and Harrison. Of the four Cleveland is the youngest. The President was born in New Jersey in March, 1837, and he is consequently 51 years old. Harrison comes next. He is 55. Morton was full of a 9-year-old boy's tricks when Harrison was born, and is now 64 years of age. "The Old Roman," Allan G. Thurman, leads them all. He was born in 1813, and Time has cut 74 notches on his stick of life.

A STRING OF SINGULARITIES.

Minor Hits by Men Not Famous Because Interesting.

Mr. Wa[illegible]s Napa, Cal., who claims that he drove a swarm of bees across the plains in 1849, said some days ago that he had the "queen" of the swarm, and that he intended to take good care of her in her old age, as she led the attacks on bands of Indians in crossing the plains which might have scalped him.

At Louisville, Ky., a few nights ago, John Long, while bathing in the river, became insane, and held a companion under the water till he was nearly drowned, and was biting his arm when assistance arrived.

Rev. James A. Merriman, a former pugilist who met Paddy Ryan and Ben. Hogan and kept saloons in Philadelphia and other cities, is preaching at Atlanta, Ga. He thinks Ingersoll will become a Christian, as after his brother died he said to Mr. Merriman, "I expect to meet my brother again."

A negro at Cypremore Prairie, La., bought a cent's worth of ice-cream of a boy and would not pay for it. Colar Legnon told him he ought to pay for it, and the negro struck him, whereupon Legnon shot the negro dead.

A religious sect called Saints met at South Haven, Mich., on Sunday. When they meet each other they kiss and hug.

Nearly 200 women and some men converts to Mormonism have left their homes in West Alabama for Utah.

Rev. Father Tolten, of Quincy, Ill., is the only colored Catholic priest in the United States. He was born in slavery. He speaks several languages.

Fashion in Hosiery.

A fashion journal says that stockings ornamented with twisted serpents will be worn with low shoes this summer. As socks are not mentioned the opposite sex will probably wear their snakes in the usual and time-honored fashion.

Lightning can be seen by reflection a distance of 200 miles.

A musical composition often justifies its name. It composes its audiences to sleep.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.
DISEASES OF MAN.
M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,
THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,
Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines,
Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, insanition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, otherwise innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation.

Forty-six business places were destroyed at the recent big fire in Chesley.

Burglars abstracted $27 from the till in the Grand Trunk station house at Durham one night last week.

On Wednesday night, about 10 o'clock, Mr. Clarkson's hotel at Campbell's Cross, together with stables and outbuildings, was completely destroyed.—[Peel Banner.

The Owen Sound Advertiser came out in an enlarged and much improved form last week. It is now an eight page, fifty-six column paper. Success, friend Little.

Dundalk thieves will steal anything from a mosquito's luncheon to a minister's wood pile, and a nightwatchman now guards the steeple of the village church.—[Pickering News.

Mr. Wherry, principal of the Durham public school, has been offered and has accepted the principalship of the Morrisburg Model School at a salary of $700, which is more than he has been receiving.

A young lady named Nellie Beaton, from New Lowell, and James Robinson, of Alliston, were married at Grose's hotel, Dominion Day morning. Her parents objected to the match, but where there's a will there's a way.—[Beeton World.

Mr. Clayton of Flesherton is next week to open out a watch making and jewellery establishment in Kelly's block Clarksburg. Mr. Clayton is a first class mechanic, with seven years experience in the business.—[Thornbury Standard.

VITAL STATISTICS.—During the half year ending June 30, 1888, there were in Collingwood 87 births, 16 marriages, and 39 deaths. For the same period last year the births were 47, the marriages 17, and the deaths 34.—[Collingwood Enterprise.

FIRE.—On Monday forenoon the barns and outsidebuildings together with a threshing machine and other implements on the Tegart farm, near Singhampton, occupied by Joseph Lougheed, were completely destroyed by fire. Loss $1,000, covered by insurance. Incendiarism is suspected.—Shelburne Free Press.

A child of Mr. J. Carnahan's, south of the river, came nearly being drowned in one of the fire tanks one day last week. A cave-in or other hole at the tank was the trap, and had it not been for the timely assistance of a playmate who seized the little one and called for help, a drowning would have occured.—Meaford Mirror.

The only joke ever perpetrated by our Division Court Clerk, T. J. Rorke, took place here on last Court Day. A lady was exhibiting a dress to Judge Lane who apparently paid more attention to the exhibitor than to the exhibited. She was good looking. In referring to the dress, Rorke remarked that it was manufactured evidence, and the Judge smoled.—[Thornbury Standard.

At Dundalk last Monday night Mr. W. A. Knapp, of Shelburne, was murderously assaulted by a gang of roughs who knocked him down and kicked and pounded him about the head and face until a couple of women ran from a neighboring house, when the ruffians made off, leaving their victim lying in a pool of blood. Mr. Knapp has some bad cuts.—[Shelburne Economist.

While sawing shingles in his mill in Egremont last Thursday Mr. Adam Watson had the index finger of his right hand cut off and the thumb and second and third fingers so seriously injured that the doctor is in doubts as to whether they can be saved or not. Should Mr. Watson loose the use of his right hand it will seriously handicap him in his business. He has the contract for the erection of the Presbyterian church in Priceville and his misfortune may retard the work somewhat.—[DurhamChronicle.

MR. MCINNIS, of Sullivan township, lost several cattle lately, and has others sick. Dr. Thomas of Tara, after a careful examination, pronounced the disease with which the cattle were affected to be pleuro-pneumonia. A representative of the Dominion Government, from Montreal, and of the Ontario Government from Guelph, in company with Dr. Thomas, visited Mr. McInnis' place last Friday and examined the cattle. They decided the disease not to be pleuro-pneumonia, but were unable to say what it was; but took away a sample of the blood for further examination. The farmers of Sullivan were greatly relieved when the disease was pronounced not to be pleuro-pneumonia.—[Owen Sound Times.

Telling what goeth on in and around Flesherton.

Miss Emily Fawcett, of Heathcote, visited friends in Flesherton and neighborhood last week.

Masters E. K. Richardson, C. Sarjeant, Wes. Armstrong and Will McFarland are camping out at Bell's Lake.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Fawcett, sr., of Flesherton, are visiting friends in Kimberley, Heathcote, Thornbury and elsewhere.

Somebody broke a pane of glass in THE ADVANCE office front window the other evening, and the fighting Editor threatens to break somebody's head.

Dr. Christoe returned from his visit to Toronto last week highly pleased with all he saw and heard in connection with the National Division of the Sons of Temperance.

Mr. and Mrs. Broughton, and son of Manchester, New Hampshire, U. S., have been the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Jos. LeGard, Artemesia, for some time past. They returned home on Monday evening last.

While sawing shingles in his mill in Egremont last Thursday Mr. Adam Watson had the index finger of his right hand cut off and the thumb and second and third fingers seriously injured.—[Mt. Forest Confederate.

Miss Russell, of Duntroon, and her cousin, Miss Russell, from Inverness, Scotland, are visiting at Mr. D. McKenzie's, Artemesia. We wish them a pleasant visit and safe return to their native land, Auld Scotia.

Whither from swampy land or stagnant pool, or from the deadly gases of City sewers, malarial poisons are the same. Ayer's Ague Cure, taken according to directions, is a warranted specific for malarial disorders.

"Cupid," the Proton Station correspondent of the Dundalk Herald, has the following item in last week's issue of that paper:— "Mr. Thos. Dally walked from Orangeville a distance of thirty one miles in six and a half hours." That is at the rate of over 4½ miles per hour! The average speed of an ordinary horse! Ahem; 'nuff said.

A little excitement was caused on Sunday last, when a number of boys went hustling down Sydenham street with the fire engine. A fire was raging in the locality of the woollen and cheese factories and it was feared that sparks therefrom might catch in the shingles. The danger passed off, but in the interval the old slaughterhouse and some rods of fencing on Mr. Geo. Stewart's farm were destroyed by fire. No very desperate efforts were made to save the foul-smelling old slaughterhouse, which went up in smoke in about half an hour.

A Moulder's Misdoings.

MARKDALE, July 14.—J. W. Potter, alis Beard, Moffat, etc., moulder, of Toronto, was employed lately by T. Moffat & Sons, foundrymen, of this place. On the morning of the 13th he left with their horse and harness. Telegrams giving a description of him were sent to points near here, and to-day he was captured by George Noble at Dundalk. He had disposed of the horse, etc., for $10, to Mr. Whitten, of Flesherton, where they were found. He is well-educated, writes short-hand, and appears to be about forty years of age. He was committed for trial and sent to Owen Sound jail to-night.—[Empire.

Bodily health and vigor may be maintained as easily in the heat of summer, as in the winter months, if the blood is purified and vitalized with Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Every person who has used this remedy has been greatly benefited. Take it this month.

The Flesherton Bank.

As will be seen by card advt., under heading of New Advertisements this week, Flesherton's new Bank is now in operation under the management of Mr. George Mitchell. The office is located two doors North of M. Richardson & Co's general store.

The Corner Stone.

The laying of the corner stone on foundation of the new Presbyterian church, in course of erection at Priceville, will take place on Tuesday next, July 24th—which, by the way, happens to be ye ADVANCE Editor's birthday. The building will be a very handsome structure when completed and a credit to the enterprising Pricevillians.

Gone to Clarksburg.

Mr. Wm. Clayton, Jr., left Flesherton for Clarksburg yesterday morning. He opens out in the Jewelry business in Kelly's block there this week and we have no doubt he will soon work up a good business, if close attention to business, good workmanship, and a well assorted stock of watches, clocks, jewelry, &c. count for anything. We have great pleasure in again most heartily recommending him to the good people in that section of country.

A Common Dumping Ground.

People living adjacent to Mr. Flesher's Mill Reserve on Sydenham street—West of the Boyne—object most emphatically to the dumping of all sorts of refuse thereon, even if it is burned up afterwards. It has become a positive nuisance and must be suppressed in one way or another. When set on fire this refuse gives forth a most offensive odor, which is driven by the winds into the houses close by. People have no right to dump rubbish in any public place, or where private rights are interfered with.

A Successful Fleshertonian.

Mr. Thos. Bates, a successful and prominent Sault Ste Marie, (Mich.) merchant, visited friends in Flesherton and neighborhood last week. Mr. Bates looks well and reports business booming at the "Soo," which place, he says, has over 10,000 people and still growing rapidly. His store is 110 feet long, is on the corner of two principal streets, and has two entrances. His business is conducted strictly on the cash basis, and sales run from two to three hundred dollars per day. He carries a $20,000 stock.

Dr. Sinclair's Visit.

The eminent Specialist for the treatment of all Chronic Diseases, Dr. Sinclair, of Toronto, will visit Flesherton on Monday and Tuesday, July 23rd and 24th, inst., for the practice of his profession. He will be found at Munshaw's Hotel as usual. Diseases of the Heart and Lungs positively treated successfully, unless too far advanced. Private Diseases, Diseases of the Brain and Nerve. Remember the date.—Monday and Tuesday, July 23rd and 24th, inst.

Burglars on the War-Path.

Burglars forced their way into Blakely & McConnell's butcher shop, Flesherton, on Sunday night last. Mr. Blakely and wife occupied the rear and upstairs of the shop and the latter heard the noise. Mr. McConnell got up and proceeded to investigate, but the midnight visitors made good their escape, and Mac merely had the pleasure of firing his revolver off a couple of times—just to let them know that he meant business. They tried a door in Richardson & Co's block, and were fooling around the door of our new bank. Mr. R. Trimble chanced to be on his balcony at the time—about 12:15 a.m.—and caught a flash of their dark lantern through an opening in the foliage of a maple tree, which intercepted his view. He heard a creaking sound as of a door being forced, but just then his big black dog also perceived the intruders and set up a howl which scared them off. This occurred before they visited the premises of Messrs. Blakely & McConnell. Nothing further occurred to disturb the rest of our citizens and it is certain the burglars went away empty-handed.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

A TEUTONIC SAMSON.

A Beer Drinking Brewer the Victor in a Tug-of-War With Horses.

A New York despatch says: Sebastian Miller, a Bavarian brewer, of No. 204 East Forty-second street, was the victor in a tug-of-war with two teams of horses at a picnic at Schentzen Park, Paterson, N.J., yesterday. Miller weighs 225 pounds, is 25 years old, and is nearly as broad as he is long. His exhibition yesterday was a repetition of one given on Friday last to a few friends and fellow-workmen at Oppermann's brewery in East Forty-fifth street. One end of a strong, heavy ladder was chained to a stake, the other being fastened to the top of a wooden horse. Then Miller put two straps over his shoulder and lay upon the ladder with his head downward. He braced his feet against an upper round and held on with both hands to one of the lower rounds. When he had thus adjusted himself two horses, of the sturdy build affected by the brewers, were hitched to the straps, to which was attached a whiffletree, and began to pull for their lives. In spite of whip and voice Miller held his position. Again and again the driver urged his willing steeds, but they made no impression upon the stalwart Teuton, whose leg and arm muscles stood out like whip cords. These horses weighed 4,000 pounds, and their driver said they were accustomed to haul loads of six and seven tons with great ease. Another team tried to pull the modern Samson from his perch, tugging and pulling until they were in a foam of perspiration, but they, too, failed, and were taken away amid cheers and jeers from the spectators. After this Miller exercised his biceps with heavy dumbbells, broke stones weighing five or six pounds with his naked fists, and performed other feats of strength. Miller says he drinks forty or fifty glasses of beer a day, and offers to bet $500 that he can hold his own against any team in the country.

DIED RATHER THAN OPEN HIS JAWS

A Battle Between a Real Bulldog and a Valuable Pacer.

A Detroit despatch says: S. Ketter, of this city, recently imported an English bulldog, warranted never to open his jaws when once they had closed on an enemy. Recently the dog was given a corner in the stable, where Mr. Ketter also kept a fast pacing horse. Yesterday Ketter locked the two animals in the barn and went away. When he returned and opened the barn door he found the horse on the floor nearly dead, while hanging to its under jaw, from which the flesh had been torn, leaving the bone almost bare, was the bulldog, alive but badly bruised. Mr. Ketter and his friends set to work to relieve the horse. The dog was choked, kicked, pounded, burned with hot irons, a wedge driven into his jaws, but all to no purpose. Finally an axe was procured and the dog's head chopped off. Even then it was difficult to loosen the grip. The horse will probably die. The skin was torn from his body in many places where the dog had evidently tried to fasten his teeth, and he was scarred from head to foot. The dog had evidently had one hold on the horse's breast, for there a large piece of flesh was torn out. Probably the dog, after breaking his rope, had wandered into the pacer's stall and had been kicked. He retaliated with his teeth and the fight began. There was hardly a whole bone left in the dog's body, and the horse will not be good for anything if he lives.

BELIEVED HER SINS FORGIVEN.

A Devotee Leaves Her Bed for the First Time in Fifteen Years.

A Rockville (Conn.) despatch says: This place is greatly stirred up over an alleged miracle. Bridget Cullen, after showing in many ways a deep religious feeling, took to her bed fifteen years ago in the month of August. She said the Virgin Mary had told her to do so in order to atone for sins. She at first would lie on nothing but a board, but after considerable urging was persuaded to take a bed. Many doctors were called, but they all gave up her case. Priests tried vainly to talk her out of the idea. She hardly ate anything, going at one time three months and twelve days without solid food. She said her heart troubled her and she could hardly move.

About a week ago Bridget told her mother that she thought her prayers had been answered and that she was to get up again. About 1 o'clock Saturday morning she felt an unusual change come over her, and for the first time in about fifteen years got up and walked around. The next day she took a walk out of doors. She informed a reporter that prayer had saved and cured her. She was 21 years old when she first took to the bed. From a child she always took a profound interest in religion, and it is thought it turned her mind.

SLEEPING IN A COFFIN.

Peaceful Dreams and Quiet Rest Secured in a Casket.

A man who will choose a coffin for a couch may justly lay claim to the badge of eccentricity. Frankford possesses such a man, and his coffin is kept in the loft over the undertaking establishment of E. H. Allen, on one of the principal streets of that suburb. The coffin is of extra large size, and is only one of the many similar furnishings which are stored in the undertaker's loft. The man who nightly sleeps in this strange bed is familiarly known to the people of the vicinity as Bob. He is a beneficiary upon the undertaker's charity, and has for years done odd jobs around the place for his board. He has occupied this coffin ever since he came to Mr. Allen's, except when his asthma has compelled him to sit up all night. Bob is a quaint little man of about 53 years, with piercing black eyes and curling black hair, now fast turning gray. He comes of one of Frankford's first families. His father was once the leading Democratic politician of the town and an extensive builder. He built all the original buildings at Frankford Arsenal more than half a century ago. He gave all his children, Robert included, a liberal education, and brought them up in luxury. The undertaker's shop is what was once the stable (altered now) of Robert's father, and part of the very loft in which he now makes his bed was in his boyhood his pigeon-house. A romance of love twines around the life of this odd little man, with his stooped shoulders and peculiar ways. His lady love died many years ago, and poor Bob often yet repeats, half audibly, some of the sonnets of which she was fond. It is thought that Bob never fully recovered from the blow caused by her death, and the workshop of the undertaker has numerous acrostics and poems of Bob's composition stuck up around its walls. The man is a mathematician of some pretensions and a fine penman. Mr. Allen has known Bob from boyhood and indulges his whims.

A visitor to Mr. Allen's shop one night found that gentleman seated in his office. "Come with me," he said, taking up a lantern and leading the way upstairs, "and I will show you Bob; he is in his bed now." Following Mr. Allen up the steps leading to the loft, the light exposed to the visitor long rows of coffins ranged around the room. One of extra large size lay upon the floor, and from within it came deep, labored wheezing. The lid was well drawn up, and nothing inside could be seen. "Hello, Bob, are you in?" said the undertaker, and the lid began to slide slowly downward with a creaking sound. A head poked up, and then a man sat upright. It was Bob. He answered, "Yes; what do you want?" and then, seeing a visitor, sank back again and drew the lid after him. "Bob's got it a little bad to-night," said Mr. Allen, alluding to his asthma, and he pulled down the trap leading to the loft and left Bob to enjoy his sleep till morning.—Philadelphia Record.

Human Beings as Pack Animals.

Professor Joseph Le Conte, of the University of California, sends the following information in reply to an inquiry in "Science" in reference to the strength and endurance of the human pack animal: "In 1844 I travelled by birch-bark canoe something like a thousand miles from Lapoint over to the head waters of the Mississippi and down the latter to Fort Snelling, at the mouth of the Minnesota River. We made several portages, the longest being nine miles. We had along two trunks and provisions and bedding for four persons for one month. The load which our two voyageurs carried was certainly 150 to 200 pounds each. They made seven miles in one day, going over the ground five times, i. e., thirty-five miles. Three-fifths of the distance they were loaded, and two-fifths going back for another load. Their plan was to take the heaviest load first (about 200 pounds), and carry it about a mile or a mile and a half, put it down, go back for another load of 150 pounds, carry this a mile or a mile and a half beyond the first deposit, then come back, take up the first deposit and carry it the same distance beyond, etc., until all was carried to the camp for the night; then, last of all, they went back seven miles to the last camp, took up the boat (which was the lightest load of all), and carried it to the camp. I will give you an account of one load. They used a leather strap about two inches and a half wide in the middle and narrower toward the end, and perhaps ten or twelve feet long. One fellow, a famous voyageur, would tie this about my trunk (about seventy-five pounds) in two places near each end and throw it over the head, bringing the band across the forehead, the trunk resting on the back, then take 100 pounds of flour and put on the trunk, with twenty-five pounds of crackers on the top of all, and walk off briskly, almost in a trot. The man was not large or very muscular, but rather lean and wiry."

Cranks Ancient and Modern.

The press of Toronto is excited over the number and variety of cranks who gather in the parks of that city. It appears that in ancient times the same trouble was experienced in the old world; for we find that the great philosophic truths of the past were first uttered in parks and public places. Socrates taught in the streets of Athens; Plato, who was called the divine, taught his new ideas at the Olympic games, and the crowds forgot the combats of the athletæ and flocked about him. Diogenes, the cynic, for years harangued the people of Corinth from the portico of the Palace of Jupiter. Aristotle, of Stagira, established a school under the trees of the Lyceum. Zeno, the stoic, held forth from a doorway in Cyprus. Xenophanes, the rhapodist, was allowed a square in Sicily to tell his ideas. Heraclitus had erected for his use a platform in the streets of Ephesus, and even Kant and Descartes did not refuse to speak in the open air.—St. Catharines Journal.

GOWNS OF SPUN GOLD.

The Marvellous Garments Which Were Worn at a Recent Paris Ball.

Never, not even in the most brilliant days of the empire, has Paris seen a more splendid fete than M. Cernuschi's fancy dress ball. It was an assemblage of the most brilliant people in the cosmopolitan society of Paris, in the most splendid private mansion in the world. Such costumes were never seen before, and the value of the jewels worn was to be reckoned by millions of dollars. A conspicuous figure was Mme. Gauthereau, the noted creole beauty. She was dressed as Cupid, and, of course, her raiment was exceedingly scanty. But she was literally incrusted with gold and gems. The abbreviated skirts of her costume were actually made of pure gold, spun and woven into gauze so delicate that it was not much heavier than silk. Another much admired costume was that of the famous beauty, Mme. Bernardaki. She was a Diana. Her bodice was of blue velvet and her skirt of white satin, and every stitch in the seams of these was marked by a diamond or sapphire. Hanging over her shoulders was a panther's skin and her hair was powdered, not with diamond dust, but with diamonds and sapphires as big as peas, all held in place by a network of gold thread. She had on her person more than $250,000 worth of precious stones.

Mlle. Marie Van Zandt, the American singer, was esteemed one of the most beautiful ladies present. The daughter of M. Carolus Duran was charming in a Japanese dress. Her father was attired as a Hindoo rajah, and not as one might have expected, as Velasquez. Mme. Pastra, the actress, wore a set of real imperial Russian sables, one of less than a dozen sets owned by persons outside of royalty. She had also a marvellous coronet of pearls and diamonds, said to be worth more than $100,000. I will not attempt to tell who all were there, unless I simply say everybody except M. and Mme. Carnot, who are in mourning.—Paris Letter in the Chicago Tribune.

A HELL ON EARTH.

New York Tenement Houses in Hot Weather.

Mulberry street, two minutes' walk from the city hall, is the centre of the Italian quarters of New York. The buildings are old, the stairs are rickety, and there is the greatest amount of space given up to dark and unhealthy rooms with the least amount of ventilation in any place in the city. There of a hot night strange and horrible sights can be seen. Leaden-eyed, haggard men and women lie on the stoops. Swarthy, panting figures hang over the fire escapes. Half-naked girls are prostrate on the sidewalks. The roar and clatter and shuffling of the crowds are bewildering. Men gathered from the dens of Naples, from the hovels of Genoa mingle with the swarming mountaineers of Calabria. Men with rings in their ears swagger about with gorgeous, but filthy dandies from the Italian cities. All is noise, drunkenness, dirt and perspiration. The pavements are hot and slippery with garbage, and the air is indescribably foul. A thousand stenches salute the nostrils. From each crowded, noisome cellar comes a new odor. And the babies? Poor little bundles of rags! Who shall picture the spawn of outcast Italy? It makes the heart of an honest man sink to see this place on a hot night. It is novel, it is wildly picturesque, it is full of action and color and noise. But it is a bitter tragedy going on in the heart of a rich, proud city, before the eyes of its sworn officials. Death and disease are written all over it. A Herald reporter went on the roof of one of the tenements on a recent hot night and counted 27 men lying on rough beds in their underclothes, without any other covering. Away in the distance could be seen the lights of the great bridge glittering like a necklace of diamonds upon the bosom of the fair city. And between the roof and the lights was the naked cross of Christ rising out of the haggard precinct, clear and distinct against the hazy, swooning, summer sky. The half-clad sleepers tossed about, sometimes perilously near the edge of the roof. He saw seven board bunks in one room, and two more stood against the wall like swathed toboggans. Vermin abounded everywhere. There were in some of the rooms miserable loopholes that served as windows, but there were no corresponding vents on the other side of the rooms to create a draught. In another room the walls and floor and ceiling were coated with grease and dirt. Bundles of rags and clothing were heaped up in every corner. Lines covered with ill-smelling garments were stretched across the apartment. A tambourine and violin hung on one wall. Bottles and pans and bags stuffed with mysterious and ill-smelling articles furnished forth the place with bric-a-brac. A stove winked its red eyes in one end of the biggest room and blistered the wall. In a cradle beside the stove a poor baby wailed. Its ignorant mother hovered lovingly over the little unfortunate. Eight or ten lodgers were preparing to go to bed. At each side of the main apartment were rude wooden platforms on which they were to sleep. The inner room contained two huge beds, which filled the place almost from wall to wall, leaving in fact less than two feet of space to walk in. Language can neither describe nor exaggerate the condition of the house. It was a vile, putrid, waterless, filth-covered hole, in which were crowded ten times as many people as the law permits.

How to Keep Your Cellar.

A great mistake is sometimes made in ventilating cellars and milk houses. The object of ventilation is to keep the cellars cool and dry, but this object often fails of being accomplished by a common mistake, and instead the cellar is made both warm and damp. A cool place should never be ventilated, unless the air admitted is cooler than the air within, or is at least as cool as that or a very little warmer. The warmer the air the more moisture it holds in suspension. Necessarily, the cooler the air the more the moisture is condensed and precipitated. When a cool cellar is aired on a warm day, the entering air being in motion appears cool; but as it fills the cellar the cooler air with which it becomes mixed chills it, the moisture is condensed, and dew is deposited on the cool walls, and may often be seen running down them in streams. Then the cellar is damp and soon becomes mouldy. To avoid this the windows should only be opened at night, and late—the last thing before retiring. There is no need to fear that the night air is unhealthy—it is as pure as the air at mid-day and is really drier. The cool air enters the apartment during the night, and circulates through it. The windows should be closed before sunrise in the morning and kept closed and shaded during the day. If the air of the cellar is damp, it may be thoroughly dried by placing in it a peck of fresh lime in an open box. The quantity of lime will absorb about seven pounds or rather more than three quarts of water, and in this way a cellar or milk room may soon be dried, even in the hottest weather.—Health and Home.

Shower of Diamonds.

It is reported from Kieff, in Russia, that in meteorites which have lately fallen there minute crystals have been found having all the chemical properties of the diamond. This is the third instance of the kind that has come under our notice, one having been reported last year from West Australia and another also from Russia. Carbon, in its amorphous state as graphite, has long been recognized as a constituent of certain meteorites. Charcoal, graphite, and diamond being chemically identical, it is not so astonishing that one allotropic form as well as the other should be found in a meteoric stone. The human genius who discovers the secret of the difference—of the physical difference between a diamond and a bit of coke or plumbago—might straightway buy up the world's gold mines and all the honors.—Newcastle Chronicle.

But, as is suggested by the Buffalo Courier, will not that smoke prevent the enemy getting a clear sight of the French?

A MILLION ON A LIFE.

John Wanamaker Carries the Highest Risks in the World.

The greatest achievement in the history of life insurance has been made by Mr. John Wanamaker, who is now paying premiums on $1,000,000 to twenty-nine different companies. The last policy issued on his life was received by him on Thursday last, and so far as is known there is no other man in the world whose life is insured for such an enormous amount. There are a number of men in this city who have been trying for years to achieve the point just gained by Mr. Wanamaker, but they have so far failed, although John B Stetson, the hat manufacturer, has succeeded in getting policies on his life amounting to $750,000. He is desirous of putting the amount up to a round million. The risks on Mr. Wanamaker's life are divided equally into life and fifteen-year endowments and he pays over $60,000 annually in premiums to the different companies in which his risks are placed. In the matter of paying premiums he is outdone by Mr. Stetson, who pays $85,000 in the same length of time, but the difference is accounted for by the fact that besides paying the premiums on the risks on his own life he also pays those on the lives of his business manager and his son-in-law, both of whom he has insured for $100,000 each, besides holding policies for large amounts on other people's lives. Should Mr. Wanamaker allow the annual dividends to go uncollected until the risks on his life expire he will be entitled to about $1,400,000. There are three companies which carry premiums of $100,000 each on his life. But Mr. Wanamaker is not the only man in this city upon whose life big risks are issued. George W. Childs is insured for $100,000, and so is Wharton Barker. Hamilton Disston is insured for about $150,000. J. G. Darlington is insured for one-tenth of a million, and his partner, William M. Runt, for twice that amount.—Philadelphia Record.

Farm and Garden Notes.

Tobacco smoke kills the green fly; water the red spider.

Cattle should be introduced to fresh pasturage gradually, particularly so if it is clover, and in fact, should have a man with them to watch for the first two days.

Much that is often allowed to go to waste upon the farm could profitably be gathered up and made into good fertilizer and applied to the land to aid and increase the yield of the crops. Give, as far as possible, the kind to each crop best adapted to secure the best growth and yield.

A very cheap way to fence poultry from the garden is to stretch three No. 12 wires quite tightly, and then weave a common swamp willow, sharpening the ends and sticking them in the ground a couple of inches. This fence does not cost over six cents a rod, and is very effective.

Cabbage and cauliflower want a rich soil. The first crop may be planted after winter frosts are over; a second for early fall or late summer use, a month later, and the late winter cabbage in July and August. Early cabbage have room enough at two feet apart; the late drumheads require three.

The cauliflower is the most succulent and delicate of all the cabbage family, and universally liked. Still the cauliflower is a rarity, because requiring peculiar care and attention in raising. It delights in a rich soil and abundance of water, which it would be well to supply artificially in a dry season.

A Dakota farmer mixed four bushels of barley, two bushels of wheat, and seventeen bushels of oats, and sowed the mixture on nine acres of land. He cut the crop when green, as soon as the barley was ripe, tied in sheaves, cured and stored it in the barn, and says he never had a better substitute for hay.

The fence corners should be cleaned out before the weeds become thick. If the weeds and grass be allowed to remain in such places until they produce seed the work of eradicating weeds from the farm will be lost. Many farms are overrun with weeds every season by neglect of cleaning the harboring places for seeding.

Turnip seed may be sown in the latter part of June or in July. The seed is very small, and consequently the soil must be fine. The land should be prepared now, using plenty of well-rotted manure, which should be harrowed in. If grass or weeds appear work the grounds with a cultivator and harrow again before seeding.

Last year there was paid as compensation by local authorities in Great Britain for cattle slaughtered on account of pleuro-pneumonia—for diseased cattle, $107,000; for healthy cattle in contact, $114,000; on account of swine slaughtered owing to swine-fever, $79,000 for diseased swine, and $32,000 for healthy swine in contact, making a total drain on the country caused by these diseases amounting to $332,000.

There has been less discussion than usual this year as to the relative values of early or late cut hay. The advocates of dried grass, or hay cut and cured early in the bloom, have gained ground of late. They have a good cause and one that is sure to gain friends whenever tried. One reason for the apparent lack of interest in the subject this year lies in the fact that in a great many communities work is about three weeks behind on account of the surprisingly wet May. So it happens that farmers will actually not be able to cut their grass as early as they would like.

John Roll, residing at Redmon, Edgar county, Ill., is the owner of the largest horse in the world. It is twenty hands high, weighs 2,500 pounds and is 5 years old. In explanation of their haste they said that the irate parents of the brides were in pursuit from Excelsior Springs for the purpose of preventing the ceremony and reclaiming their daughters.—Kansas City Times.

There Might be Two.

This one is sick; his wayward fate cries out
Against the leech, the calomel, the bed.
Oh! inconsiderate person, cease to pout—
You might be dead!

And this one has the mitten; he has wooed;
Vainly, alack, his wooing has sped.
Well—even in this there's comfort, rightly viewed—
He might be wed!

And here is one who whines; his all is swept Away in panic, he has had to "fail."
He should, I think, be cheerful, that he's kept
Safe out of jail.

But late I lost a twenty-dollar-bill—
And did I wring my hands that I had blundered?
Not I, indeed! I'm very thankful still
'Twas not a hundred.

South, should I e'er capsize when walks are bad,
And my good clavicle involve in wreck,
Serenely, I should say—How very glad
It's not my neck.

Oh! trust me—better not to make ado
At the few miseries of our common lot.
There's millions of 'em—if we only knew!—
We haven't got.

An Adorable Crew.

Lazily, slowly drifting
Down with the quiet stream,
It seemed to me in my gladness
That it all must be a dream.

For Mabel—my darling Mabel—
Was trying to steer the canoe,
And as I lay there watching
I fell in love with the crew.

I thought how pleasant it would be
To—Thunder! Where are we now?
The canoe had gone down to the bottom,
With a hole a foot long in the bow.

MORE MOTHER THAN WIFE.

Some Unpleasant Phases of Excessive Maternal Love.

There are two distinct kinds of women in the home—the one more wife than mother, the other more mother than wife. We all know houses where the woman either sacrifices the husband to the children or the children to the husband. Sometimes she sacrifices both to herself, and sometimes the husband joins hands with her in her "philoprogenitiveness" and makes the nursery the Delos of the house and the school-room the Mecca of the life. In which case unfortunately the chances are that the children are spoiled by being made too much of—whereby they become selfish and self-considering—while the interests of the parents, narrowed down to the dimensions of the home only, cause their intellects to suffer from the rust of disuse and the mildew of stagnation. They become socially dull, and tiresome as companions. They are unable to talk of books or pictures, of politics or music, of science or travel—in short, of things of any general interest. They can talk only of their children; and the smallest events connected with them take the dimensions of imperial interests on which hangs the fate of thousands. As infants you hear of their maladies, or, it may be, while still unable to guide their hands to their mouths, of their sharpness and intelligence. Grown older and able to talk in that mysterious tongue which no one not initiated understands, you hear of profound remarks proving a depth of philosophy which promises a future Plato, to say the least of it. Grown older still, their prowess in the cricket field, their successes at school, their superior attainments generally form the staple of parental conversation—of all the life of the father and mother—and when the last of the nestlings' plumage has been shed—the last chip of the egg-shell has fallen off—and the children have become the young people of their generation, that parental interest increases rather than diminishes, and the absorption is even greater. When the husband does not join hands with a wife who is more mother than wife, he has a bad time of it. To the ordinary man children are delightful playthings while they are little—leeches to be fed with the blood of gold, when, grown older, they need much and demand more. But for the most part they occupy a subordinate place in real life, and are included in the mass rather than made the apex of the whole. To such a man as this their advent often proves but a questionable kind of blessing if his wife is one with whom the children eclipse the husband. He married for personal companionship, for sympathy of tastes and pursuits, for general pleasantness of association; and for the first few months he seemed to have found all that he desired. His wife was sweet and complaisant; ever ready to walk with him, ride with him, read with him, listen to him, talk to him—ever ready to be the companion he had pictured to himself as the summit of human happiness. The first child destroyed the whole scheme and broke up the plan of his life—dispelling forever the rainbow-colored dreams which youth and love had woven for him. The woman he had married was more mother than wife; and, from the moment of its birth, "baby" became the centre of her existence, and the nursery was the throne-room of the house. Henceforward the husband was but as a dead planet revolving in its place, giving no joy, and of use only as a part of the general order, not as the great radiating sun of the whole system. Nothing now can be done as heretofore. With the nervousness of a young mother, baby's existence seems to her to be daily and hourly threatened, and death is warded off only by incessant care. So far from feeling that nature is strong and the forces of conservation more powerful than those of destruction—given the most ordinary wisdom of management—the young mother thinks that on her unsleeping vigilance alone hangs the frail thread of life, and that if she relaxes for a moment the enemy will be upon her darling and the great thief will have stolen her treasure. The dinner has to wait if baby has not gone to sleep—who knows what direful mischance may not ensue on this irregularity of the little creature's repose? There can be no music in the evening because the piano might awake the baby—who would sleep like a top in the midst of a battle or in the heart of a storm. Even voices must not be raised too high, laughter must not be too loud, doors must not be slammed with too brusque a motion—nothing must be done void of the one thought—not to awake baby. The husband's whole home life is revolutionized. His cigar is taken away from him—smoke is bad for baby: and to kiss baby with a tobacco-tainted breath is to poison it. Did not a certain American mother write her experiences in this direction? Was not her child continually poisoned by its father who smoked and played with it afterwards? And did he not give up his pernicious nicotine for the sake of the more precious life? So it goes on, and the husband sinks into insignificance—going farther and farther down in the heaven, where once he had been the vertical sun, till finally he passes out of sight below the horizon, and the wife cares for him no more than for a pair of hands capable of writing cheques which keep the house going. As time goes on and the olive branches increase the mother becomes more and more absorbed in her children, and the wife dies daily more entirely to her husband. She keeps her sons at home as long as she can, and coddles them out of all reason and manliness. She dresses them esthetically, and takes care that their hair shall be long and curling. When the time finally comes for the day school—which dreaded time she cannot longer postpone—she keeps them at home on the slightest pretense and makes the master's life a burden to him by reason of her remonstrances against the length of their tasks and the severity of his impositions. When they have finally to leave her for a more vigorous state of things she prejudices their standing in the school by the absurd precautions which she takes for their isolation from all chances of evil, and the spirit of exclusiveness of superiority, of stand-offishness that she has so diligently fostered in them. If her sons escape the pits she has dug for them and turn out passable men, then are they to be congratulated on a good fortune not granted to all. It is the same with her daughters. When grown up and introduced, their pleasures count for more than her husband's wishes, health, happiness and very life—and she would rather he went bare of necessaries than that they should want superfluities.—London Queen.

SAFETY IN HOUSE DRAINAGE.

The Dangers Involved in Ignorance of Sanitary Principles.

In his census reports, Dr. Billings estimates that, in the United States, one hundred thousand deaths occur every year from strictly preventable diseases alone. This is unquestionably a very moderate estimate, and, if there are reckoned also twelve cases of serious illness for every death, we see what a great amount of suffering results from ignorance or sanitary principles. But how is this ignorance manifested? Are not our architects competent to deal with the problem of household sanitation? It will be said, perhaps, that it is the province of the architect to direct the entire work of house-building, and to arrange every detail of the fittings. But it should be considered that the science of sanitation is broad and comprehensive. Years of study and of experience in sanitary work are necessary for a proper understanding of the subject. It is perhaps unfortunate that there is so little in the severe and unpleasant details of this work to commend it to those whose tastes have led them to the study of the more attractive principles of artistic construction and the science of æsthetics. An architect should have the hand of an artist, but there are few men whose nature is so broad as to combine truly artistic tastes with a love for the details of difficult mechanical work, involving the necessity for undertaking comprehensive and scientific research. It is the province of the engineer to engage in an occupation of this kind. His natural inclinations and his rigid training in scientific pursuits fit him especially for the direction of matters relating to drainage and sewage disposal.—Popular Science Monthly.

The Moral Use of Wealth.

If "an Englishman's hell is not to be making money" as Carlyle so savagely asserted, the American people, under similar conditions, suffer the same torment. Every avenue of business is now overcrowded, and the race for money-getting goes on with unparallelled speed, while the higher educational, judicial and clerical professions, which are comparatively underpaid, are neglected. The fact that a business career is more easily entered upon than any other, that its higher prizes are so great and comparative wealth so easily won, and that social and political preferment are so largely conditioned upon the possession of a large fortune, attracts to a life of mere-money-making thousands of young men whose abilities are far more needed in the higher professions. While the pursuit of wealth is one of the conditions of the nation's prosperity, it is liable to the penalty of promoting materialistic views of life, inordinate love of gain among individuals, and a habit of meanness in the ordinary affairs of life. Avarice, greed of gain, and miserly hoarding or misuse of wealth are the penalties the race pays for its thrift. That these are very serious penalties, having a disastrous influence upon national as well as upon individual character, is sufficiently clear. Nature always avenges herself upon the miser by narrowing his vision of life, dulling his sensibilities, and usually by reducing his family to beggary at the end of three or four generations. In the wider sphere of national life the effect of avarice is seen in slow progress of art, literature and religion, and in what M. Renan and Matthew Arnold have both lamented as the condition of the middle classes of England and the United States, "their intellectual mediocrity, their vulgarity of manners, their superficial spirit, their lack of general intelligence." Such national defects can only be removed by the voluntary enlistment of individual wealth in the cause of education and religion.—Providence Journal (U. S.)

Mrs. Langtry's new play for next season is called "A Love Story."

The genial autocrat is not appreciated by everybody in his own town. One day an American gentleman went into a barber's shop as Dr. Holmes was going out. "Do you know who that was that just went out?" asked the barber. Being curious to see what account of Dr. Holmes the barber would give, the visitor shook his head. "Why," said the barber, "that's old Dr. Holmes." "And who is Dr. Holmes?" "Oh, he's been a doctor here a great many years. I believe he ain't practicin' any more, but he's thought a good deal of."

Rev. John Jasper, the colored minister of Richmond whose views on the sun have made him celebrated, has been preaching since 1840. He was a slave when he professed Christianity, and his first religious labor was performed among his fellow workmen in a Richmond tobacco factory.

THE SCIENCE OF NAMES.

How to Bestow Graceful and Euphonic Names on Children.

Writers spend much time and thought in selecting a name for a play or novel, for they know that success is largely dependent on it. Parents, however, are strangely careless and unscientific in giving names to children. In the Harvard and Yale catalogues of last year I found but two or three really good combinations. Usually, when a new-comer arrives, some old family name is taken; or if the parents exercise an original choice, they are too much excited to be guided by any sound euphonic principles. They forget that not only from the social point of view it is very advantageous to have one's name remembered, but that from the business point of view notoriety is capital, and must be obtained by persistent and ingenious advertising. But if a certain amount of notoriety could be obtained for John Smith by an expenditure of time, money and ingenuity represented by x, and spread over a period of three years, it is safe to say that the same amount could be obtained for Hans Arrowsmith by x-4 in eighteen months. Nor is the saving of time or money on the part of the knocker at the gate of notoriety the only thing to be considered, for, from the altruistic point of view, the lessening of the effort of recollection on the part of the world is far more important. The economy of the public stock of energy wasted in innumerable unconscious efforts to remember a name without any corners for the memory to grasp, but persistently thrust before it, would result in an increase of available mental force applicable to settling the question of future probation, or to raising the ethical standard, or to reforming the tariff, or to disposing of the surplus. The importance of the subject leads me to suggest one or two of the chief fundamental principles of the science of naming children. The system is simple, and any provident parent can easily master and apply it.

1. Avoid odd, or eccentric, or poetic combinations, and be guided by euphonic quality only. It is true that an odd name may be remembered, but the associations with it will not be pleasing. The idea of oddity of affectation may attach to the shadowy personality built up in the mind of the public. Under this rule, hyphenated names, especially hyphenated Christian names, like Floyd-Jones Robinson, are to be avoided. Writing the first given name with an initial and the second in full is also evidently opposed to correct scientific principles.

2. The best form of name is a dactyl and a spondee, like "Jeremy Taylor." Every one has heard of the "Shakspeare of divines," and has a dim idea of an agreeable personality attached to the name. Had his name been Charles Taylor, it is far within bounds to say that his reputation would be about one-third of what it is now.

3. If the surname is not one that can be treated according to the above rule, it should be fitted with a given name, such as to bring the combination as nearly as possible to the above length and cadence, as Sidney Dobell, Ellery Vane, Henry Ward Beecher, Dante Rossetti, Theodore Watts and the like; or, otherwise, to two long syllables, like Mark Twain or Bret Harte. The subdivisions of this branch of the subject are too numerous to be given, but all rest on principle No. 2. The phonic value of the surname is, under our system, the controlling element in practically applying the science of names.

The great value of names beginning with Mac or O is evident, because they so readily combine with the ordinary Christian names. Any one would be favorably disposed to Arthur O'Connor, for instance. A boy pervades our quiet neighborhood simply because his name is Johnny MacWorter. He is not in any respect a remarkable boy, but his name forces him into prominence by its phonic value. There are some ten or twelve boys who are comrades, but he and another dactyl-spondee boy, Emory Watson, are the only ones ever spoken of. No doubt there are others who do as much mischief and make more noise, but these two reap all the fame.—Atlantic Monthly.

A Reporter's Silence.

The Duke of Cambridge was through Liverpool lately, and his presence there recalled to an old newspaper man, who was there when the Duke visited it last, a rather amusing story. The Duke of Cambridge, Mr. Cardwell and several other distinguished men were to dine with the Mayor at the Town Hall. Their speeches were expected to be of European importance, and great interest attached to the occasion. Owing to the great attendance the Mayor could find room for only one reporter. There was much protest on the part of the press, but it was of no avail. An expert reporter named Murphy was selected for the work, and arrangements were made to supply all England with his report, which he was to dictate, when the banquet was over, to a dozen stenographers; but Mr. Murphy had been treated with the utmost discourtesy by the Town Hall officials. He was placed apart from the guests, and was either supplied with a seat among the pots and pans of the waiters, or in an orchestra occupied by the fiddlers. However, he took his revenge as well as his notes. When he returned to his office, where a dozen reporters were awaiting him with breathless anxiety, he smiled benignantly upon them and told them to go home. "Go home," gasped a celebrated editor, "what do you mean? Have you not got the report?" "I have taken down every syllable," said the redoubtable Murphy, "here are my notes," slapping his pocketbook, "and there they remain. I have been grossly insulted and not a line of the speeches shall ever see print." He was as good as his word, and so far as England and the world were concerned the great men at the Town Hall might have uttered their words of wisdom, congratulation and warning in a thunderstorm from the top of Snowdon.—Liverpool Post.

A Heroine.

At Punxatawny, Pa., last week, a little lad not 3 years old somehow got in front of the railway train, and, while other onlookers held their breath in horror, Miss Chanler, young and pretty, rushed up and at imminent risk caught him from almost beneath the wheels and fainted amid the cheers evoked by the heroic act.

LANGUAGES NEEDING NO TONGUE.

Articulate Whistling, the Drum Method and Finger Speech.

At the last meeting of the Berlin Anthropological Society Lieutenant Quedenfeldt, a German officer who has lived on Gomero Island, one of the Canary group, described a whistling language which is used by the inhabitants. The language does not consist of any arbitrary series of signals or sounds. It is described as ordinary speech translated into articulate whistling, each syllable having its own appropriate tone. The Gomero uses both fingers and lips when whistling, and Lieutenant Quedenfeldt asserts that he can carry on a conversation with a neighbor a mile off, who perfectly understands all he is saying. The practice is confined to Gomero Island, and is quite unknown to the other islands of the archipelago. The adoption of the whistling language is said to be due to the peculiar geological construction of Gomero Island. It is traversed by numerous gullies and deep ravines running out in all directions from the central plateau. As they are not bridged they can only be crossed with great difficulty. Hence a man living within a stone's throw of another in a straight line has often to go many miles when he wishes to see and speak to his neighbor. This, it is conjectured, led to the adoption of whistling as a useful means of communication, which has gradually assumed the proportions of a true substitute for speech. It is described as being anything but unpleasing to the ear.

This reminds one, says the St. James' Gazette, of the drum language of the natives of the Cameroons, mentioned in Bucholz's book on West Africa, by means of which the most complicated messages can be conveyed to villages at a distance when occasion necessitates it. For this purpose a peculiar shaped drum is employed. By dividing the surface into uneven halves that instrument, on being struck, may be made to yield two distinct notes. By these, and shortening and lengthening the interval between each note, a code is established with a regular sequence of taps, strokes and intervals, capable of expressing every syllable in the language. All the natives understand this code, and so highly elaborated is it that a chief can, by its means, summon to his presence any villager whom he desires to see, intimating to the latter at the same time the purpose for which he is required. In this way, too, messages can be sent from village to village over wide stretches of country, the drummer in one hamlet transmitting to the next the signals he hears, and with extraordinary rapidity.

Bucholz had proof on one occasion of the utility of this drum language and its capabilities as a medium of communication. The negro who had charge of his canoe obtained leave one morning to attend some private business of his own, which took him to the other side of the river. The man remained away an unreasonable time and Bucholz got angry, as he was waiting to leave the place. Another negro suggested that they should drum for him. The drummer was sent for and instructed to inform the missing servant that his master was angry with him and that he was to return at once. In a few minutes the man returned with the inevitable apologies for the length he had been away. He had perfectly understood the message drummed out to him, as Bucholz ascertained by inquiring of him.

Equally curious is the so-called sign language or finger speech of Oriental traders, largely employed on the east coast of Africa in the direction of Zanzibar. Walking through a market place in this region of the world the traveller will often witness a strange sight. A couple of grave, long-bearded Arabs will step aside, each will put his hand up the other's sleeve, and they will then begin apparently to pinch each other's fingers for a few minutes. Often the performance will be varied. One will unroll his long turban cloth, or perhaps lift up his long mantle and then cover his hand, and concealed beneath this the pinching of the fingers will proceed as before.

A River of Hot Water.

The great Sutro Tunnel, cut to relieve the celebrated Comstock mines at Virginia City, Nevada, of the vast quantities of hot water which are encountered in them affords an outlet to 12,000,000 tons every 24 hours, or about 3,000,000,000 gallons Some of the water, as it finds its way into the mines, has a temperature of 195 degrees, while four miles from the mouth of the tunnel the temperature ranges from 130 degrees to 135 degrees. To obviate the inconvenience which would arise from the vapour such a vast quantity of water would give off, the flow is conducted through the entire tunnel, four miles, in a light flume of pine. At the point of exit the water has lost but seven degrees of heat. Sixty feet below the mouth of the tunnel the hot water is used for turning machinery belonging to the company, from whence it is carried off by a tunnel eleven hundred feet in length, which serves as a waterway. Leaving the wasteway tunnel, the water flows to the Carson River, a mile and a half distant. This hot water is being utilized for many purposes. The boys have arranged several pools where they indulge in hot baths. The miners and others use it for laundry purposes, and arrangements are being made whereby a thousand acres belonging to the company are being irrigated. It is proposed to conduct the hot water through iron pipes, beneath the surface of the soil near the roots of thousands of fruit trees which are to be planted, and in a similar manner give the necessary warmth to a number of hot houses to be used for the propagation of early fruits and vegetables

THE KING OF MOTORS.

It Still Holds the Throne against All Competitors.

The steam engine is first, last and all the time the king of motors, and holds the throne against all comers. Now, why should not those who live by attending to it learn something of the master they serve? No doubt many are desirous of doing so, and the very first step to and gaining a knowledge of steam and steam engines is to read what others have discovered about it. Young men, especially, must remember that the day of squirt-can engineering has gone by, and the demand is for men who can run engines understandingly, or with some knowledge of the principles involved. The demand may be less in some sections than in others, but the day is not far off when engineers will have to be such in fact, not in name. Men will not be tolerated who cannot show a better record than: "This certifies that John Smith is a sober man, etc. Now, there are no books which teach engineering pure and simple. There never was a book and there never will be one which can make an engineer out of a tramp or handy man who happens along. An engineer is the product of time, experience and study—that covers him in all lines. It takes time to get an experience, and when one gets it he must get that of others also; he must get his facts correctly from the fountain head, and not from gadabouts around a threshing machine engine. The place to get facts about steam engines is in a common philosophy, for the steam engine is controlled by laws written in every book on physics. There are no chapters on it therein; there is no part which says one must turn this cock or open that valve; nothing in common philosophy tells one when a boiler is going to burst so in many words; but in the laws of heat, of atmospheric action, in the behavior of water under certain conditions, the engineer finds instruction which he cannot do without, and which enable him to get over difficulties which floor others.—Mining Engineer.

Children's Lunches.

A child at play from morning until night, in the open air, will make away with an incredible amount of food, and be healthier for so doing; but let it eat upon the regular hours for taking it, it will then enjoy the blessing of coming to the table hungry, for that certainly is a blessing, as those deprived of an appetite can heartily testify. Nor is it any sign of distress that they are clamorous for the meal to be served, their keen appetites by assuring you that there is not much probability of complaints being made of the dishes set before them, provided there is always enough. A prominent physician and surgeon once said of his three children, who were then well-grown young men, and the picture of health: "We never allowed our children to lunch between meals, and they were all good eaters; we never allowed them tea or coffee, and they were all good sleepers." All those same children have since graduated from college, are holding high positions to-day in the professional world, robust and of excellent habits, though inheriting a frail constitution from a mother who died young. The annoyances and discomforts arising from the habits of lunching must be innumerable; the interruptions of your time for reading, sewing or social calls by a hungry child demanding attention that must not be set aside; the untidiness that must follow the preparations of even plain bread and butter for one, two or three children; the extra steps required from either servant or parent, these alone make a strong plea against such a habit; but when we consider the violation of the whole dietary system, and all the evils that stand waiting to give them a grip of their punishment for their indulgence, we cannot help crying out against the evil and urge a better understanding of all laws of digestion and what is quite as important, of indigestion.—Good Housekeeping.

Photography in Criminal Courts.

Photography is gaining prominence in criminal courts. With its help a Berlin merchant was recently convicted of crooked ways in keeping his accounts. The slightest differences in color and shade of inks are made manifest in the photographic copy. Blue inks appear nearly white; brown inks, on the contrary, almost black. The books of the accused were submitted to a photographer, who took off the pages concerned and brought into court the most undoubted ocular proofs of the illegitimate after-entry of some of the accounts. A subsequent chemical test substantiated this evidence. The photographic is to be preferred to the chemical test, because it brings its proofs into the courts and submits them to inspection, at the same time leaving the document under examination unharmed, while the results of a chemical test must be taken on the evidence of the chemist alone, and the writing examined is perhaps destroyed. In another case similar to the above the changing of the date of a note by an insignificant erasure and addition was proved by means of photography.

Oriental Dentistry.

I had slept little, as I was suffering greatly from a toothache. The sheik declared that there was a skilful dentist in the encampment, and as the pain was almost unbearable I made up my mind to put myself in his hands rather than endure it any longer. He was accordingly sent for. He was a tall, muscular Arab. His instruments consisted of a short knife or razor and a kind of iron awl. He bade me sit on the ground, and then took my head firmly between his knees. After cutting away the gums he applied the awl to the roots of the tooth, and, striking the other end of it with all his might, expected to see the tooth fly into the air. But it was a double one, and not to be removed by such means from the jaw. The awl slipped and made a severe wound in my palate. He insisted on a second trial, declaring that he could not but succeed. But the only result was that he broke off a large piece of the tooth, and I had suffered sufficient agony to decline a third experiment.—Early Adventures in Persia, Susiand and Babylonia: Sir Henry Layard.

AGRICULTURE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA AND THE NORTH-WEST.

The Editor of that very popular agricultural monthly magazine, The Farmer's Advocate, recently visited our North-West Territories and British Columbia. Mr. Weld (the Editor in question is an experienced farmer, as well as a clever journalist, and what he says in connection with these Western regions of our great Dominion, possesses much weight.

Speaking of the North-West, Mr. Weld says:—"Our North-West will now progress faster than any part of this continent..... Having just passed through a portion of our grain and stock-producing west, we saw over-flowing granaries and herds of fat cattle, and know that the necessaries of life are more accessible to a larger number of persons here than in any other part of the world; where we know of more millions of acres of available fertile land to be given away, and know that emigration is turning from the "sunny south" to the fertile, beef and grain producing north; even American farmers find that bread, beef and labor are better than lassitude, rags and bannanas. The great North-West is destined to be filled with millions of inhabitants; towns and cities must spring up."

In reference to British Columbia, however, Mr. Weld's remarks read very much like our old friend, Mr. J. M. Webster's, letters. British Columbia, says Mr. Weld, is very rich in its minerals and fisheries, but neither the soil nor the climate are favorable for agricultural pursuits. Speaking in this connection, Mr. Weld observes:—"There are a few small farms to be seen in the low valleys that are found on this line (Victoria and Nanimo railroad). The climate and soil make it a struggle for agriculturalists to make much here. A few farmers exist, but any emigration agent or Government that attempts to move the agriculturalist from our Eastern Provinces to British Columbia for the sake of getting the little money or property they have, ought to be tarred and feathered; and still we have such unprincipled persons in Government employ, and some of our Government officials know it. We could depict fearful results from injudicious movements."

If people will and must leave Ontario, and are desirous of settling down permanently in the best agricultural districts outside these Eastern Provinces, it is certainly obvious that Manitoba and our North-West Territories should be their destination, and not British Columbia or the impoverished Northern and Southern States and Territories. Contrasting the conditions of the settlers in the North-West with those in the United States, Mr. Weld thus forcibly remarks:—

"Sudden squalls have fearfully shaken the British nation. For centuries past the ballast and helmsman have always righted her, and both appear as sound as ever despite her foes. One's worst enemies are apt to be those of one's own household. Yes, and when we compare the hungry soil, the parched land, the miserable-looking, half-starved hogs, dogs and cattle we saw when passing through Tennessee, part of Kentucky, Arkansas and Alabama; when we depict the poor miserable looking homesteads, the ragged, dirty, sickly appearance of the "white trash," as many of the inhabitants are termed; when we know that the majority of the farmers there neither own their land, nor even the seed sown, where grass and wheat will not grow, and compare the healthy appearance, the well clad, hopeful independent spirit of the owners and tillers of the soil in our North-West Territories, and the unlimited extent of unoccupied rich fertile lands that will produce grain and grass—it is almost impossible to imagine the superiority of spirit and physique of these two classes. Crops of cotton, tobacco and oranges are very pleasing to the eye, but afford comparatively a poor substitute for beef and flour. The sunny south may be all very well to visit in our winter season, but the debilitating effects of continued residence takes the energy and spirit out of white settlers, thousands of whom have been drawn there by the laudatory, one-sided statements of interested agents."

That a great wave of emigration is already rushing on towards the vast and fertile unoccupied plains of the North-West, is undoubted. The tricks of unscrupulous Yankee agents are being exposed every day by duped emigrants; and in due time it will dawn upon the people of this country generally, that the Toronto World's stirring and patriotic cry—"Canada for the Canadians"—possesses a world of meaning.

The "Glorious Twelfth."

Big Gathering at Markdale.--Maxwell and Kimberley to the Fore.

THE CELEBRATION ELSEWHERE.

IN many parts the "Glorious Twelfth" is more generally observed as a public holiday than Dominion Day. The deeds of King William III, of "glorious, pious and immortal memory," seem to be as fresh in the minds of tens of thousands of people to-day as they were one hundred and ninety-eight years ago. And, although our natal day is pretty generally observed as a national holiday, there is not the enthusiasm manifested so characteristic of the twelfth. No doubt the gay colors, the stirring notes of the fifes, the thundering boom of the drums, coupled with the circumstances which gave rise to the celebration, have much to do with this. And then, too, more than a hundred years before the birth of this rapidly growing young nation north of the 49th parallel, the Orangemen all over the world had made the "Glorious Twelfth" their big day, and had been wont to assemble themselves to the sounds of fife and drum with every recurrence of that memorable day.

Artemesia Township is noted far and near for its Orange lodges; but more particularly for the respectability of its Orangemen. We use this term advisedly, for many rowdies and "riff-raff"—to use a common expression—have time and again found their way into Orange lodges to the disgrace of that noble Order. Artemesia Orangemen, as a whole, are as God-fearing, orderly, respectable and fine a body of men as can be found in Canada. Why? simply because they live up to the principles of their Order, which are founded on the only solid and sure foundation, viz., the Bible.

This year Artemesia's loyal sons went to Markdale to celebrate the 12th. About 10:30 a.m. a stream of carriages and vehicles of every description began to pour through the streets of Flesherton on the way to Markdale—carrying Orangemen and visitors. The horses, in many instances, were gaily decked with orange ribbons, artistically arranged, and with neat little Union Jacks attached to the bridles. The whole presented an animated appearance; and amid the booming of drums, the cheerful notes of fifes, and flags and banners gaily floating on the breeze, the procession moved on to our sister village of Markdale. Grand old "214" came out strong as usual, with Eugenia, 4th Line, Flesherton Station and our own town Orangemen largely represented. It is estimated that over 2,500 people, including Orangemen visited Markdale. Stirring and patriotic addresses were delivered by Rev. J. W. Shilton, B.A., of Flesherton; Major Joseph Rorke, M.P.P., of Clarksburg; Rev. A. Wilson, and Rev. Mr. Buggins, of Markdale. Thos. Kells, Esq., District Secretary, gave a very interesting report in connection with the Society. There were nine lodges of Orangemen present, which, when headed by the Markdale Brass Band, assisted by members of Flesherton Band, made an imposing procession. Dr. Sproule, M.P. for East Grey, having been called out to attend an urgent case in connection with the practice of his profession, was unable to take his place on the platform—a fact generally regretted, as the Dr. is an eloquent speaker and very popular with all classes of the people. Dr. Christoe, the grand old Reeve of Artemesia, was absent attending the National Division of the Sons of Temperance in Toronto, where, however, he had the pleasure of witnessing the magnificent Orange procession in the Queen City. The speaking in Markdale took place on the Agricultural grounds. The day's celebration passed off in an orderly and pleasant manner and the visiting brethren returned to their respective homes early in the evening.

The Twelfth was also celebrated at Maxwell, Kimberley and Dundalk in a fitting manner—large crowds visiting each of those places. In the first named place some three or four lodges marched in procession. In the latter village, the chief feature in the large procession was the handsomely uniformed members of the Young Men's Protestant Benevolent Association of Dundalk, who were the "observed of all observers." If Orangemen generally would adopt a uniformity of dress (or uniform) these demonstrations would possess much greater interest to outsiders than they do. It is not necessary to go to the expense of purchasing costly uniforms in order to bring about such a desideratum; but let there be a uniformity in the ordinary clothing worn, the same as obtains in city Orange lodges.

OUR MUSKOKA LETTER.

DEAR ADVANCE,—You will no doubt be somewhat surprised to find me here, yet here I be, as you will see if you come rusticating to Muskoka. Well, Sir, you have no doubt heard much of Muskoka, so that anything I can tell you will scarcely be news. Gravenhurst, as you will remember, was last year almost totally destroyed by fire, yet now I find it re-built almost altogether as thickly as ever and I am told very much more substantial. Several large and elegant brick buildings having been erected on the ruins of the old frame, flimsy, fire traps of old. After a run by rail of 6 hours from Toronto through a landscape, ever changing, beautiful uplands, luxuriant lowlands, spacious, elegant and well kept farms of the older townships with their pleasing homesteads, shining out in a June sun, on to Barrie, on Lake Simcoe's pretty shore, then, as one rolls along to the northward, gradually the face of country changes and in place of snug farmsteads, orchards and gardens, one becomes sensibly aware that the backwoods country is heaving in light, rough, rugged farms. Stoney land, saw mills, huge wood piles, lumber and timber flit past as the chariot rolls along over hills, through vales, across marshes, until the guard calls Orillia, which we notice is apparently a thrifty and pretty business place, situated on rising ground at the north end of Lake Simcoe. Let the school boys and girls get their map and look up the route and point out the place where I am. Come boys and girls, look it up, you will think you were here then. I'll think I see you. Toot on to the north we go. Not stones but a land of rock bursts on the view the R.R. bed blasted out of the solid rock and that in some places hills of rock on over bridges that span creeks, rivers and isthmas', through vales that echo back the shrill whistle of the iron steed, as he heralds his approach and warns all living out of the way of his unyielding tread.

Never in my life did I so sensibly, visibly understand the meaning of the term—"The Everlasting Hills." Promontary, hills,—nay, mountains of solid rock abound in this part of our Canada. What need to go to the far-off Rockies to see mountains of rock when 100 miles or so to the East of Flesherton or Eugenia such scenes abound. And lakeland truly is here along this road—now here, now there on the right, on the left, directly in front, for our coach appears to leap lakes like fun until right here Gravenhurst is reached. 112 miles from Toronto, planted on a plateau between two lakes; on the west Lake Muskoka, on the east Gull Lake—a town all over Pine Lake, Long Lake, Short Lake, Leg Lake, Rat Lake, Other Lake, Little Lake, Big Lake, &c., &c. not on the maps, with 3,000 population. And one must be very indifferent to landscape beauty if one would not at once vote this a lovely spot. What a picturesque scene bursts upon the view on arising on bright June morning, and for the first time gazing on Muskoka Bay—hid from the main lake by 8 miles of rocky headlands, covered with what remains of a once gigantic primeval pine woods. The smoke of fifteen sawmill chimneys blackens the air above. This appears to be the main industry of the place. Thousands of logs float in the Bay and hundreds of thousands yet to come. The constant hum of machinery in work hours and the busy flitting to and fro of many men demonstrate that this is no small trade done here. At present the employees are out on strike, demanding 10 hours as a day's work, instead of 10½ or 11, and pay every two weeks instead of monthly. The men being principally associated with the Knights of Labor, appear to be strong and consider they are right in their action, while the mill-owners think that ½ an hour a day would hurt no one, and as long as the money was sure to be planked down pay day the men had little to grumble at. So the matter stands just now, yet many think strikes are an unmixed evil all the same. F. T. C.

VISITORS FROM SOUTH AMERICA.

Miss Julia E. Milne and Miss Agnes Milne—daughters of Rev. Andrew A. Milne, Methodist Episcopal minister at Buenos Ayres, South America—are the guests of Wm. Milne, Esq., Township Clerk of Osprey. The young ladies were born in South America and speak the Spanish language very fluently. They have been attending the Wesleyan, Academy at Wilbreham, Mass. U. S., acquiring a thorough knowledge of the English language. They will spend the two months vacation at Mr. Milne,s, after which they will return to the Academy.

Mr. Wm. Anderson and Mr. Chas. Sutton, of Rochester. U. S., are the guests of Mr. George Milne, Osprey.

Mr. Mitchell, Flesherton's new Bank manager, spent Sunday last with his numerous friends in Feversham and neighborhood.

The new School Section set apart in this Township (Osprey) by the County Council Committee, composed of Dr. Christoe, Wm. Ferguson, Esq., ex-P. S. I., and Judge Macpherson, has already sent a number of pupils to the entrance exams. at Collingwood, and is a great boon to the ratepayers living within its borders. Seventy-five pupils have been in daily attendance during the winter months, which is substantial evidence of clear-sightedness of the County's special Committee aforesaid—particularly Dr. Christoe and Mr. Ferguson, who actually did the bulk of the work themselves. The best bell in the Inspectorate is to be found hung up in the belfry of this school house.

The Township Fathers met at McGirr's hotel, Feversham, on Saturday last. Members thereof were all present, Reeve Douglas in the chair.

Mr. T. A. Blakely, an old Flesherton boy, is doing a rushing business in the carriage making line at Maxwell.

Very few Township Clerk's in the Province stand higher, in an official capacity, than Wm. Milne, Esq., Osprey's clever Clerk. His books and manuscripts generally are perfect models of neatness and order. His work is never slovenly done. Clear-headed, intelligent, quiet, unassuming, dignified, and gentlemanly—he possesses all the qualifications which entitle him to a place in the first ranks of the public officials in our numerous municipal "legislatures" in this country. Always courteous and willing to give information in connection with the duties of his office, he reminds the writer very much of our own genial and popular Clerk, W. J. Bellamy, Esq.

TO THE DEAF.—A Person cured of Deafness and noises in the head of 23 years' standing by a simple remedy, will send a description of it FREE to any Person who applies to NICHOLSON, 30 St. John St., Montreal.

The Reason Why

Ayer's Pills are so popular is, that while always reliable as a cathartic medicine, they never leave any ill effects. This is because they are purely vegetable, and entirely free from calomel or any other dangerous drug. In all cases, therefore, whether the patient be old or young, they may be confidently administered.

In the Southern and Western States, where derangements of the liver are so general, Ayer's Pills have proved an inestimable blessing. D. W. Baine, New Berne, N. C., writes:

"I suffered a long time with stomach and liver troubles. I tried various remedies, but received no benefit until I commenced taking Ayer's Pills. These pills benefited me at once. I took them regularly for a few months, and my health was completely restored."

Throughout New England, next to lung diseases, Stomach and Bowel Complaints are the most prevalent.

Dyspepsia

and Constipation are almost universal. Mr. Gallacher, a practical chemist, of Roxbury, Mass., who was long troubled with Dyspepsia, writes:

"A friend induced me to try Ayer's Pills, and, after taking one box without much benefit, I was disposed to quit them; but he urged perseverance, and, before I had finished the second box, I began to experience relief. I continued taking them, at intervals, until I had used eleven boxes. Suffice it to say, that I am now a well man, and grateful to your chemistry, which outstrips mine."

The head and stomach are always in sympathy; hence the cause of most of those distressing headaches, to which so many, especially women, are subject. Mrs. Harriet A. Marble, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., writes that for years she was a martyr to headache, and never found anything to give her more than temporary relief, until she began taking Ayer's Pills, since which she has been in the enjoyment of perfect health.

From our own Correspondent.

The anniversary of the Battle of the Boyne was celebrated here in right Royal style. There were five Lodges of Orangemen met and made a very respectable gathering; a stand was erected in a grove on the farm of Mr. W. Long, when addresses were delivered by a number of Rev. Gentlemen, when they sat down to a splendid dinner got up by Mr. E. Linley. Everything passed off harmoniously and thus ended one of the best conducted 12th of July's ever held in this place.

Mr. J. Can, of Collingwood, has opened up a factory here for manufacturing ginger pop and all such innocent drinks.

Dry weather continues and farmers are complaining. Hay is mostly very light, all other crops are very short and pasture for cattle is getting very scarce.

Mr. W. Paul has returned from Manitoba where he has bought a farm and intends to move there in the near future.

Priceville Items.

From our own Correspondent.

The fair on Manday was rather dull. About 20 head of fat cattle and a few milch cows, were sold, prices ranging from $12 to $50 for steers and heifers, one cow and calf brought $30. A Flesherton butcher bought a "Beef critter" for $7.

Rev. D. McLeod is home again from his extended holiday trip through the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. R. Watson is taking his holidays, visiting friends in Buffalo, also in the vicinity of Niagara Falls.

Mr. James McIntyre is home on a visit to his friends.

The dispute between Alex., Johnie, and Malcolm is about ended. We presume Pathmaster Conkey will not be sorry. He must have been tired of hearing such trifling complaints as "Please Mr. Pathmaster, make Malcolm keep his waggon off the side of the road," and, "Please Mr. Pathmaster make Alex. take the corner of his fence of the road allowance.

Letter from W. Suggitt, Esq.

Killam, June 15th, 1888.

After an absence of forty-seven years from the land of my birth, as you know, I left Flesherton on the 23rd of May for a visit across the ocean, taking the C.P.R. to Orangeville, from there to Brampton, Cooksville, Trafalgar, spending pleasant times amongst old friends, also Toronto, having messages to friends at home.

Taking the G. T. R. on Tuesday 29th, leaving Toronto at 9:30 for Montreal and arriving the same evening at 8:50. Spent next day viewing the sights and places of interest such as the Methodist church Gt. St James street, where I heard the first sermon in Canada preached by the Sainted Wm. Squires, on the death of the late Lord Sydenham, the Governor-General, who was then lying dead. I may mention also that the late Rev'd John Borland, of blessed memory, was stationed in the same circuit. As young man, Rev. Mr. Squires, Colleague, visited French church, the Bridge. Well, such is life, as a panorama, the world is changing. Friends dear to the heart pass away. Well, Heaven knows no change.

Beyond this vale of tears
There is a life above,
Unmeasured by the flight of years
And all that life is love.

The daybreak of Thursday, May 31st, opened bright and clear and with it the Dominion steamship, Oregon, Captain Williams, carrying her living freight of souls, all bound for the shores of the Motherland. The run down the St. Lawrence was as pleasant as could be expected. Some making new acquaintances, others reviving the friendships of past years.

On the evening of our first day the old walls of Quebec are reached and whilst the ship rides at rest for some 12 or 15 hours. Many avail themselves of terra firma to find business suspended and the inhabitants keeping a general holiday.

Her work done, the ship now wends her way down the Gulf. All on board with anxious eyes longing to get the first glimpse of the mighty deep, and soon our hopes are realized. The cry is heard, "icebergs ahead!" and for some two or three hours, snow capped mountains of ice are dotted here and there. No sooner have these been passed than a dense fog sets in, and our ears are amused with the shrill voice of the whistle, but fortunately the mist soon passes, the Heavens are visible and passengers are again crowding to the vessel side to see the long wished for whales by dozens, turning their ponderous bodies or lying lazily upon the surface of the water.

Land is now lost sight of, the hills die away in the distance and a world of water is around us. We are ploughing our way across the broad Atlantic. After a delightful passage of three days the Lord's own day arrives. Deeply impressive religious services twice which were heart cheering and by some will never be forgotten.

Who Does it Belong to?

To the Editor of The Advance.

Mr. Editor,—I with other residents of Flesherton have been trying to find out the following:—Do the streets in the vicinity of Heard's carriage works belong to that firm or to the public? If the former, traffic should be directed into some other channel; if the latter, then the streets should be cleared by the proper authorities of the nuisance existing to the annoyance of every one else in the neighborhood as well as the travelling public.

Yours,
Q.K.

The congregations of Charleston and Alton, at a meeting yesterday presided over by Rev. W. A. Hunter agreed to extend a hearty and unanimous call to the Rev. A. Wilson, of Markdale and Flesherton. The Stipend promised is $850 and a manse. Messrs. Clark, Bell, Macdonald, and Dick were appointed delegates to prosecute the call before the Presbytery of Orangeville which meets on August 6.—[Dufferin Advertiser.

BARN BURNED.—We learn that the barn of Mr. John Hamilton on the Garafraxa Road, about six miles from town, was burned together with a number of implements on Sunday morning last between two or three o'clock. It is thought the barn must have caught fire by a spark from a passing train, as a portion of fence had been burned a short time previous from that cause. The barn, which was a large one, was insured in the Sydenham Mutual for $1,500.—[Owen Sound Times.

The Model Farm at Guelph is a remarkably well managed institution. It is a model for our Ontario farmers to imitate. An Egremont farmer a season or so ago purchased six bushels of seed grain from this Model farm. He sowed the grain and in due time it came to maturity. Now the honest yeoman is ready to swear that he got full value for his money, for out of his specimen no less than six varieties sprang forth. But for all that he buys no more seed grain from the same source.—[Durham Chronicle.

No Universal Remedy

has yet been discovered; but, as at least four-fifths of human diseases have their source in Impure Blood, a medicine which restores that fluid from a depraved to a healthy condition comes as near being a universal cure as any that can be produced. Ayer's Sarsaparilla affects the blood in each stage of its formation, and is, therefore, adapted to a greater variety of complaints than any other known medicine.

Boils and Carbuncles,

which defy ordinary treatment, yield to Ayer's Sarsaparilla after a comparatively brief trial.

Mr. C. K. Murray, of Charlottesville, Va., writes that for years he was afflicted with boils which caused him much suffering. These were succeeded by carbuncles, of which he had several at one time. He then began the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after taking three bottles, the carbuncles disappeared, and for six years he has not had even a pimple.

That insidious disease, Scrofula, is the fruitful cause of innumerable complaints, Consumption being only one of many equally fatal. Eruptions, ulcers, sore eyes, glandular swellings, weak and wasted muscles, a capricious appetite, and the like, are pretty sure indications of a scrofulous taint in the system. Many otherwise beautiful faces are disfigured by pimples, eruptions, and unsightly blotches, which arise from impure blood, showing the need of Ayer's Sarsaparilla to remedy the evil.

All sufferers from blood disorders should give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a fair trial,—avoiding all powders, ointments, and washes, and especially cheap and worthless compounds, which not only fail to effect a cure, but more frequently aggravate and confirm the diseases they are fraudulently advertised to remedy.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

CHAPTER XLIII.

It was later on the same day, and the shades of night were gathering over Erindale. The cottages were all closed, and only little glimmers of light were shining through the cracks of the shuttered windows in those where the inmates had not yet retired to rest. The Oliphant Arms was closed, although the light streamed ruddily from the fanlight over the door, still lighting up the little bit of street upon which it fell, and falling upon the bowed, shrinking figure of a woman who was making her way down the street as fast as her trembling limbs and the slippery state of the roads allowed her. If any of the villagers had met her they would have recognized her immediately; but the uneven, irregular street was empty and deserted, and there was none to see the school-mistress as she hurried along.

The clock in the church tower had just struck 11 as she had left the cottage adjoining the school-house, sending Jip back, when he followed her, to the threshold of the door, and bidding him "Watch," and, when the dog had obeyed, she had locked him into the house and hurried down the hill, pale and trembling and nervous, starting at every sound, and pressing her clasped hands to her heart, as if to still its throbbings.

But her agitation was not entirely to be attributed to nervous fear of the dark night. Had her face been visible, any one might have seen upon it a great fear which was not due to physical alarm.

"Am I doing right? Am I doing right?" she muttered as she pressed on. "Oh, Heaven help me—Heaven help me! I do not know where to turn or what to do. Am I prudent in taking this step? And yet—and yet I cannot let him die—I cannot see him suffer so cruelly without obtaining what assistance I can. Oh, Jack, if you were not Guy's friend—if you were not Guy's friend!"

The tears were gathering thickly in her eyes; but she dashed them away impatiently as she went on, quickening her steps for a few minutes, then from very weakness obliged to slacken them again. And so, stopping at intervals to recover breath and regain sufficient strength for another start, she made her way to a pretty white house at the other end of the village, and there she paused, looking up wistfully at the windows whence no light issued.

The white house faced the road, being divided from it only by a small strip of garden, and the hall door was in the centre; but there was a side door, from which a narrow stream of light issued, and toward this Shirley walked rapidly. But when she had reached it, and had even lifted her hand to the bell, she hesitated, shrinking back and moving away again; then she advanced and pulled the bell, giving it a swift sudden pull which rang a peal that aroused all the echoes of the quiet house. Almost immediately the door was opened by a sharp looking boy of fifteen or sixteen.

"My word, but you did ring!" he was beginning saucily, when he recognized the applicant and adopted a more respectful tone. "I beg pardon, ma'am; I did not see you at first. Do you want the Doctor, Mrs. Grant?"

Shirley was leaning against the wall by this time, panting and breathless; but she forced the white lips to answer in the affirmative.

"Yes," she said. "Is he in!"

"No, Mrs. Grant," the boy answered, civilly. "He is out at a dinner-party at the Rectory; but I expect him back every moment. Will you wait to see him, Mrs. Grant? Or shall I run around and fetch him?"

"I will wait," she answered; and the boy ushered her into a little waiting-room, which looked cold and comfortless, with the fire dying out in the grate.

The lad turned up the gas into a sudden flare, which made Shirley cover her eyes for a moment; then he pulled forward a chair and placed it for her.

"I will tell the Doctor you are here, ma'am," he said, "the very minute he comes in."

"Thank you," Shirley said, wearily, as she sunk down upon the chair he had placed; and then, when the boy had left and she was alone, she crossed her arms upon the table and let her head sink upon them in an utter and intense weariness of mind and body. But the weakness was only momentary; almost immediately she raised her head, and, rising, she began to pace up and down the little waiting-room, pushing back her hair from her brow with a troubled, bewildered, almost despairing expression.

"Have I done right? Oh, merciful Father, have I done right?" she muttered, as the little feet hurried to and fro swiftly and unsteadily. "Dare I trust him? Dare I trust any one? And yet the responsibility is so dreadful that I cannot bear it alone. Oh, Heaven help us all—Heaven help us all!" she prayed incoherently.

When she heard the doctor's step coming up the gravel path she started, and, sitting down, tried to wait his entrance with something like composure; but it was a very pitifully eager face which met the new-comer's glance as he entered the waiting-room; and the eagerness died out of Shirley's eyes and a terrible disappointment stole into them as she saw that it was not Dr. Lloyd, but his assistant, Mr. Litton, who stood before her.

"Mrs. Grant!" he exclaimed, in some surprise. "I hope you have not been waiting long? You ought to have sent Saunders for me. Do you want my services yourself, or have you been doing one of your kind actions and sitting up with some poor patient of ours?"

He was a slender, handsome man of seven or eight-and-twenty, with a pleasant kindly face and keen blue eyes which looked at Shirley rather attentively as she stood opposite to him with wide desolate eyes and that intense disappointment on her face. He had put out his hand to her on entering, and mechanically she had put her shaking, trembling fingers into it; and they lay there still, firmly clasped in his gloved hand.

Mr. Litton had been dining at the Rectory, and over his evening clothes he wore a heavy ulster, in which he looked flushed and happy and handsome. Some of the Erindalites thought that there was "something" between Dr. Lloyd's handsome assistant and the Rector's pretty daughter. Whether it was the case or not, it was certain that he was very frequently at the Rectory; and there was a pleased, well-satisfied smile in his blue eyes which showed that he had not met with a cool reception there this evening.

"What can I do for you?" he said, gently, seeing Shirley's agitation, and speaking kindly and soothingly. "You look very ill yourself, and it is a cold night for you to be out. Did you come alone?"

"Yes," Shirley faltered.

"Was there no one who could have saved you such a long walk? You look quite exhausted."

"No one."

"And the need was urgent?"

"Yes."

"Poor child!" he said, pityingly. "I do not think many can need my professional services more than you do yourself at this present minute. Wait a minute and I will get you something which will do you good."

He was turning away, when her voice arrested him.

"Dr. Lloyd?" Shirley said, sharply.

He looked at her in some surprise.

"Dr. Lloyd has gone to London," he said, quietly. "Did you not know? He went with poor Mrs. Pitt, and——"

A groan escaped from Shirley's lips as she sunk down upon a chair, her hands hanging helplessly by her side. Dr. Lloyd was an elderly, gray-haired man whom she could have trusted; but Mr. Litton was a stranger.

"Shall I not do?" he said, gently. "He left me as his substitute, you know, and, in default of better professional aid, I can only offer you mine."

Shirley shook her head despairingly.

"I do not doubt your ability," she said, unsteadily, "but——"

"Nor my willingness, I hope?" he put in, warmly. "I shall be happy, believe me, if I can be of any use to you."

"You are very good," she answered, covering her face with her hands for a moment; and, seeing how terribly agitated she was, he quietly left the waiting-room, and, going into the surgery, mixed her a soothing draught and a restorative, with which he presently returned.

"Drink this," he said, gently but firmly; and Shirley, because it was too much trouble to resist, obeyed him, looking up as she finished into his face with wistful, wondering eyes.

"Mr. Litton, can I trust you?" she asked, a great earnestness in her voice and on her face.

"I hope so," he said, smiling a little. "My dear Mrs. Grant," he added, with a gravity which sat well on his handsome face, "in the profession to which I have the honor to belong we become the recipients of many secrets, and a doctor is obliged to be as trustworthy as a confessor himself. If what you have to tell me is something which you hesitate to divulge because you fear it may get wind, you can dismiss your fears. You may safely trust me, for your secret will never pass my lips."

"It is not my secret only," she said, looking up at him with wistful, troubled, pleading eyes. "Oh, if I dared tell you—if I dared tell you!"

"Is it my loyalty you doubt?"

"No—oh, no!"

"Then why do you hesitate? I am not as old as Dr. Lloyd, certainly; but I can keep a secret as well as if my hair were gray."

Shirley rose in her uncertainty, clasping and unclasping her hands in her excessive agitation.

"Mr. Litton, forgive me," she said, brokenly, after a pause. "I am in very great distress and perplexity, and I do not know what to do. I hardly dare trust any one."

"Would you like me to give you my word of honor that I will say nothing of anything you tell me?" he asked, gently, pitying the intense distress from which she was so evidently suffering.

"Will you?" she said, eagerly, turning to him with outstretched hands.

"Yes—willingly, if it will alleviate your distress."

"Oh, thank you—thank you!" she cried. "Will you promise me to ask no questions but such as are absolutely necessary, to tell no one in all the world where I shall take you to-night, and what you see there?"

"I promise."

"It is a matter of life and death," she said, brokenly. "Oh, if I could only be sure of what I ought to do! It seems as if there were no alternative, as if I must trust you; and yet—and yet—"

She wrung her hands passionately. Roland Litton looked at her with sincere compassion; he could not feel offended at her want of confidence in him; every other feeling merged in pity for her distress.

"Oh, help me!" she said passionately. "Tell me what to do?"

"How can I, Mrs. Grant? I can only say that you may safely trust me."

She looked at him eagerly and keenly for a moment.

"Yes," she said; "then I will trust you. Will you come with me?"

He looked surprised for a moment, then said hastily—

"Certainly; I am at your service."

He opened the door for her, and, with a desperate effort, she regained sufficient composure to precede him out of the room, across the little passage, and into the garden.

"Don't sit up for me, Saunders," Mr. Litton said, carelessly. "I have my latch-key, and in all probability I shall not be required to night."

"Very well, sir," said Saunders, who shut the door noisily after Mr. Litton, as he followed Mrs. Grant down the path, joining her at the gate.

She was calmer now; the draught he had given her was taking effect, and the face she turned toward him had lost its agonized expression of fear.

"Are you well wrapped up?" he asked, gently. "I fear not," he added, as he drew her shawl round her and gave her his arm, "I wish I had brought a wrap for you."

"I do not need it," she answered, quickly. "I am quite warm, almost too warm indeed."

"Too warm on this bitter night!" he said, incredulously. "It is not a fit night for a delicate woman like yourself to be out."

Notwithstanding the intense nervous excitement under which she was laboring Shirley Glynn noticed, and never forgot, her companion's thoughtful care of her that night. He talked easily and pleasantly, thus avoiding the embarrassment of a silent walk, but without giving her the trouble of answering. He described the dinner-party at the Rectory, meanwhile taking care not to walk too fast for her, but suiting his steps to hers, and making her lean upon him when they came to the hill on which the school-house stood. And then, seeing that his light chat distressed her, he ceased, and gave his whole attention to affording her the support she needed far more than she owned even to herself.

At last they reached the school-house, and Shirley's trembling fingers unlocked the door and admitted him into the little passage. When she had closed the door she fastened it securely on the inside, and then led the way into the sitting-room. The lamp was burning on the table, and there was a bright fire.

With an abrupt gesture Mrs. Grant pointed to a chair, and bade him sit down for a moment; then throwing off her shawl and bonnet, she went quickly up stairs, leaving Mr. Litton alone. Five minutes passed while he waited for her, and the sound of voices reached him as he sat—muffled voices, it seemed to him, broken once or twice by a dreadful cough. Then she came down and beckoned to the doctor. He put his hat on the table and went to the door at which she stood.

"I have trusted you," she said, "and you have promised. Now come with me, and remember the promise you gave me."

"I will remember it," the young man said, gravely, as he followed her up the narrow staircase into the room whence the the voices had proceeded.

CHAPTER XLIV.

"It is a very painful business altogether," said Lady Oliphant gravely. "I really do not know what to do for the best."

"I am afraid, my dear, that you have no one but yourself to blame for the annoyance," said Sir Frederic quietly as he looked up from his newspaper. "You took Mrs. Grant on trust, although you might have guessed that there was some mystery about her. That a woman of Mrs. Grant's appearance and education and manner should be wandering about the country in a state of destitution was in itself a most suspicious circumstance, which I pointed out to you at the time."

"My dear Frederic, you were almost as much infatuated about her as Madge and I were."

Sir Frederic smiled.

"I am glad you said 'almost,'" he remarked. "Because, if you had said 'quite,' I should have thought you were jealous! Yes, I will own frankly that the singular uncommon charm of manner which Mrs. Grant possesses was not without its effect upon me. But I cannot conscientiously say," he added smiling, "that I ever approved of the child's intimacy with her."

"She seemed good and sweet and honest," Lady Oliphant said sorrowfully. "I cannot even now think of her as anything else."

"My dear Margaret," said Sir Frederic, putting away his newspaper and going to his wife's side as she stood at the window looking out on the terrace in front of the hall, "women to all appearance as sweet and true as Mrs. Grant have turned out depraved and worthless; and, although I hope I should be the last man to judge any one hastily, I cannot help thinking that you have been grossly deceived in your school-mistress, and that the sooner you get rid of her the better."

"Oh, Fred," Lady Oliphant exclaimed sadly, as she recalled Mrs. Grant's pale, sad face and wistful eyes, "do you really think it is so bad as that?"

"It is not desirable to retain a school-mistress about whom the whole village is chattering," he said gravely. "You can go nowhere without hearing some remarks about her. The frequency of Mr. Litton's visits at her cottage at all hours is sufficient in itself seriously to damage her reputation, and she has been seen walking with him and letting him out of the house in the middle of the night. Moreover, she must have had some good reason for dismissing the little servant and living alone, as she had been doing, ever since Christmas. We cannot blind ourselves to these facts, my dear, however much we may wish to do so. Besides—"

"Besides what?" Lady Oliphant asked, looking up eagerly.

"Besides, Jarvis, when he was at the Oliphant Arms the other day, heard a man say that, on Christmas night, when he was walking over the hill on his way from Adinbrooke, he saw Mrs. Grant kneeling before her fire, while a man, who sat in a big arm-chair beside her, had his arms around her and his head over hers."

"Was it Mr. Litton?" said her ladyship in a low tone.

"No, he said not—that it was a stranger."

"Oh, Fred, I do not believe it! Of course one can understand about Mr. Litton. She is so lonely, poor thing, and he is very nice and pleasant and agreeable, and it is quite likely that they have fallen in love with each other; but that Mrs. Grant is so depraved—No," continued Lady Oliphant energetically, "I will not believe it!"

"I thought Litton was engaged to Rosie Venn?" said Sir Frederic dryly.

"He paid her a great deal of attention," said his wife. "And poor Rosie is very much distressed about this rumor concerning Mrs. Grant. Really it is very painful; and I do not know what to do."

"My dear Maggie, your duty is perfectly plain. You must dismiss Mrs. Grant at once, and find a less attractive and mysterious teacher for your schools. To-day is a whole holiday, and you had better drive up the hill and get rid of a very disagreeable task, unless you would prefer to write to her."

"I think it would be kinder to see her," Lady Oliphant said, with some hesitation. "I suppose it must be done, Fred?"

"There is no alternative, dear. I regret it for your sake and poor Madge's, for the child is sincerely attached to Mrs. Grant; but it cannot be helped. At any rate, the child must not go to the cottage," he added decisively. "I cannot allow that!"

"No, certainly not. I am glad Guy and Mr. Ross are here, as their society will amuse her and distract her attention."

Sir Frederic's glance followed his wife's, which had fixed itself on a group standing on the terrace, at some little distance from the house, having just ascended the broad stone steps leading from the flower-garden upon which the breakfast-room opened. It was a pretty group, and to the mother's loving eyes it was a significant one; and, while she smiled, she sighed softly at the thought it conjured up.

Madge, in a pretty skating costume of brown velveteen trimmed with dark fur, was standing by one of the tall marble vases which stood on either side of the steps. Major Stuart, in his heavily furred overcoat, leaned against the other, looking at her with a smile in his grave eyes; while close to Madge, standing on one of the steps and looking up at her with an intent tender gaze, was a handsome fair young man, whose face was bronzed and grave, but whose eyes, when they looked at Madge, were very soft and wistful.

"Would you like it, Fred?" Lady Oliphant said softly, as she slipped her hand through her husband's arm, and smilingly indicated the group. "I am afraid he will want to take her from us."

"Which of the two, Maggie—Stuart or Mr. Ross?"

"Mr. Ross, of course," she answered. "Poor Guy will never love any one again! He gave his whole heart once; besides, he is too old and grave for our Madcap."

"He might sober her," said Sir Frederic, smiling.

"Mr. Ross has quite sufficient gravity for that," Lady Oliphant said. "What a sad story it is!"

"What is? Our Madcap's love affair?"

"Oh, no—I hope not—but that mysterious disappearance of poor Lady Glynn! Guy made every research at the time, as you know; and, since Mr. Ross' return, they have begun them again, but with the same result—failure!"

"Yes, poor thing, she is dead," said Sir Frederic musingly. "It is impossible that they should have been unsuccessful otherwise. Poor girl; hers was a sad life!"

"It was a terrible thing, that murder of her husband! Do you know I think Guy has never got over it?"

"Poor fellow; he has been cruelly treated. Think how many of his friends have turned their backs upon him, and still think him guilty of a dastardly crime! Upon my word, Maggie, I cannot think of it with any calmness!" Sir Frederic continued, with great warmth. "A man so brave and noble and true, with such reputation as Guy Stuart always had, to be thought guilty of a crime of which the judge and jury acquitted him! It was strange, was it not," he added more calmly, "that it should all have taken place during our only absence abroad?

"Yes—very strange. Well, daughter mine," she continued, with a quick change of tone as Madge and her companions came up to the glass door and entered the room, "what is the programme for to-day?"

"We have not quite decided," Madge replied. "I was going to escort Guy and Mr. Ross up to the school, and introduce them to Mrs. Grant; but they say they would rather see her in her official capacity than in private life, so, as to-day is a holiday, we must defer the visit."

"Yes, certainly," said Lady Oliphant hastily. "Why not drive to Lee Park? Lord Lee has written to papa to say that he has thrown the lake open to skaters, and that he hopes we will go."

"Oh, that will be charming! Papa, shall we go this morning? Are you disengaged?"

"I am quite at your service, Madge. Mr. Ross, have you forgotten how to skate?"

"I hope not," he answered, smiling. "It used to be a favorite pastime of mine in my boyhood. My sister and I did an immense deal of skating in Germany and Holland," he added, a shade falling over his face.

"Then you will teach me the outside edge," said Madge, with her pretty imperious grace. "I am longing to be able to skate really well."

"I shall be delighted," said Jack, his face brightening with pleasure. "But I have no skates, Miss Oliphant."

"Papa can accommodate you," said Madge, laughing. "Guy, will you come with us?"

"With much pleasure."

"And you will skate?"

"I am afraid I am too old, Madgie!"

"Too old!" echoed Madge gayly. "Why, even papa skates!"

"Even papa!" said Sir Frederic laughingly. "And pray is papa such a Methuselah, you Madcap?"

"Papa is a dear gray-haired personage, and very handsome still," laughed Madge, looking at him fondly.

"But I am gray-haired too, Madgie," said Major Stuart smiling.

"You're not gray-haired, Guy; you have just a few white hairs beneath your beard. How I wish you would dispense with it!"

"Why? Don't you like my beard?"

"No, I prefer the long mustache, you used to wear."

"You don't remember me when I wore a mustache only, Madgie."

"Don't I? What an absurd idea! I remember you perfectly! Well, are you coming with us?"

"I was going to ask Guy to drive me as far as the school-house," said Lady Oliphant, smiling. "And if he will do so, we will follow you to Lee Park. Am I unreasonable, Guy?"

"Unreasonable to give me a great pleasure?" he answered, smiling. "If so, you are always unreasonable where I am concerned, Lady Oliphant."

"Can not we all go together?" suggested Madge. "I should like to have a peep at Mrs. Grant, mamma."

"We will go together in different vehicles," said Sir Frederic laughingly. "I will take the break, and Stuart can drive mamma in the pony carriage. I know what your 'peeps' at Mrs. Grant are, Miss Madge, and I should prefer, if possible, getting to Lee Park in time for luncheon. But we will start together, if you like."

"And you will drive over the hill?" said Madge coaxingly.

"Why, yes—it is the shortest way," said her father, smiling. "I will go and get ready. Maggie wrap up well, dear, as it will be bitterly cold."

"Madge, you had better put on your sealskin," said Lady Oliphant, as she went away to get ready; and Madge obeyed, leaving Major Stuart and Jack Ross on the terrace together.

"How charming she is!" the latter said, with a little sigh, as he watched Madge disappearing through the door of the breakfast room.

"Yes," assented Guy rather absently, speaking as if his thoughts were far away.

"Guy, does she ever," Jack began, and then hesitated a little—it was always painful to him to bring that look of sorrow to Guy's face which the mention of Shirley's name always brought there—"does she ever remind you of Shirley?"

Guy Stuart started slightly, and waited a minute before he answered.

"Yes," he said gravely. "She has never done so before; but this time it has seemed quite strange how constantly she reminds me of her."

"Ah, then, it is not my imagination!" said Jack Ross eagerly. "I think it was that similarity of manner which attracted me to her at first. Of course there is not the slightest personal resemblance."

"Not the slightest," assented Guy, thinking of Shirley's rare beauty, and contrasting it with Madge Oliphant's bright prettiness.

"And that only makes it all the more remarkable," Jack said eagerly. "It seems so very strange that two people who have never met should have the same little tricks of manner and speech."

"Yes; it is very strange."

There was a short silence; then Guy laid his hand gently on his friend's shoulder.

"Are you falling in love with the child, Jack?"

Jack colored hotly under his Eastern bronze.

"What makes you think that, Stuart?"

"Many things. But you have not answered my question, old fellow."

"What chance should I have?" said Jack, with some agitation. "A poor fellow like myself would not dare to aspire to the heiress of Erindale Hall."

"Why not?"

"I should not like to be called a fortune-hunter, Guy."

"Who would call you so?"

"Her father and mother—Madge herself perhaps," the young man said, with a little tremor in his voice.

"I am sure they would not. Their only wish would be for the child's happiness; and I think she likes you, Ross."

A gleam of eager delight flashed into Jack's blue eyes.

"If I could think so I would be the happiest man on earth," he said eagerly. "But no—I dare not. Such happiness is not for me, and—"

"And what?" Guy asked gently.

"And when they knew, as know they must, that I had been the real cause of Shirley's misery, they would hate and despise me."

"How must they know it, Jack?"

"Because I could marry no girl without telling her that episode of my past life, Stuart," he said gravely and tremulously. "I call myself an honorable man; and yet poor Shirley gave her happiness and perhaps her life to save me from being branded as a felon."

"No fault, so bitterly repented of and atoned for by years of patient plodding, industry and self denial, could stand against you now, Jack—at least, not with such people as the Oliphants, who are far too liberal minded to hold such a narrow creed as that," said Guy earnestly. "Do you care for her, Jack?" he added, after a pause.

"With my whole heart," Jack answered, almost with a groan. "Guy, I have been undecided whether it was not better to go away and never see her again."

"You are but a timid wooer, Jack. Don't go away. Wait patiently. Since you love her so well, it cannot do you much harm to wait a little longer even if your affection is not returned. Ah, here she is, pretty child—a sight to make an old man young!" added Guy, smiling as he went forward to meet Madge, while Jack, in almost uncontrollable agitation, moved away in an opposite direction.

"What is the matter with Mr. Ross?" she asked, as she held out her pretty little hand for Guy to button her gloves.

"A very common malady," said Major Stuart, smiling, as he bent over the little hand.

"And what is that?"

"Disease of the heart."

"Disease of the heart!" echoed Madge the bright color fading somewhat. "Do you mean that he is ill, Guy?"

"Not exactly," he answered gravely, while poor Madge hurriedly recalled all the stories she had ever heard about people who had disease of the heart—how they had gone about without even knowing the malady by which they were affected, until suddenly they had dropped dead, without a warning or a moment's preparation.

"Guy, what do you mean?" she said with tremulous earnestness; and Guy, looking up from the little gloves, saw how pale she had grown.

"Nothing, but he has fallen in love, my poor Madgie," he answered, smiling "Why, you look quite pale and startled!"

"Well, no wonder! Guy, you are very provoking."

"Am I? Then I will say no more," he answered, smiling. "May I not button the other glove?"

Madge held out her hand to him; and, as he took it into his, he felt that it was a little unsteady. Jack's chance did not seem very hopeless in Guy's eyes just then.

"With whom has Mr. Ross fallen in love?" she asked presently.

Guy made no answer, and she repeated the question.

"With whom do you suppose?"

"I really don't know. I am not acquainted with all the ladies whom he knows."

"Nor am I."

They Have Found No Ghosts.

The Psychical Society of England reports that its efforts to discover ghosts have been unavailing. The same complaint is made by the American Society for Psychical Research. Paradoxical as it may sound, therefore, these organizations have lost their spirits because they could not find any. It is to be hoped, however, that they will not give up their quest of the coy and elusive ghost. Rome was not made in a day, and the scientific investigation of the psychical phenomena which have for so many ages puzzled mankind cannot be effected until after years of patient effort. —New York World.

Says Sir Lyon Playfair in Macmillan's Magazine: "The protective duties of America remove from us the most formidable competitor in the markets of the world by raising its cost of production. They protect England in all neutral markets and enable us to send even into the United States $125,000,000 of manufactured goods, while they return to us less than $15,000,000 of their manufactures."

The City of the Dead.

They do neither plight nor wed
In the city of the dead,
  In the city where they sleep away the hours.
But they lie, while o'er them range
Winter blight and summer change
  And a hundred happy whisperings o flowers
No, they neither wed nor plight,
And the day is like the night,
  For their vision is of other kind than ours.

They do neither sing nor sigh
In that burgh of by and by,
  Where the streets have grasses growing, cool and long;
But they rest within their bed,
Leaving all their thoughts unsaid,
  Deeming silence better far than sob or song.
No, they neither sigh nor sing,
Though the robin be a-wing,
  Though the leaves of autumn march a million strong.

There is only rest and peace
In the City of Surcease,
  From the failings and the wailings 'neath the sun,
And the Wings of the swift years
Beat but gently o'er the biers,
  Making music to the sleepers, every one.
There is only peace and rest;
But to them it seemeth blest,
  For they lie at ease and know that life is done.

THIS is getting to be a cold world for babies. Owners of tenement houses have a prejudice against them, hotel keepers frown on them, and now a New York court has granted an injunction against the erection of a baby asylum in that city. And yet the baby is a great institution that can't be wiped out.

J. A. VANDYNE, of East Liverpool, O., was recently in St. Clairsville, and from idle curiosity visited the jail. In Gertie Williams, a woman confined there on a charge of murder, he recognized his only sister, who left home mysteriously several years ago and whose whereabouts were unknown until the chance meeting.

LORD WOLSELEY says there is a greater danger now menacing England than the possibility of a foreign invasion—the extravagance of the English women. He has noticed, he says, ever since he was a boy an increase in the tendency of English women to spend a much larger portion of the incomes of their husbands than they were entitled to on articles of attire.

AMONG the passengers on the White Star steamer Britannic were five young men from Oxford University, England, two from Cambridge University, three from the University of Edinburgh, and one from the University of Utrecht. They are all on their way to the College Students' Summer School and Encampment for Bible study, to be conducted at Northfield, Mass., by D. L. Moody.

A GERMAN doctor has discovered that the masculine heart weighs more and is larger in proportion than the susceptible organ possessed by the gentler sex. This statement is another blow for woman to parry and explain away to her own satisfaction. She has been able to endure the physiological fact that her brain weighs less than tyrant man's, but when it comes to her own pet cardiac region, she hasn't the spirit of a mouse if she submits to any scientific shrinkage of its generous proportions!

THE fungus known as vegetable beefsteak, found on old oak trees, is really nutritious and wholesome. When broiled it is difficult to distinguish it from broiled meat. "There is a slight acid flavor in the fungus when cooked," says the English Mechanic, "which adds considerable piquancy to the dish; it is extremely tender, succulent and juicy, and resembles tender steak or tongue in a remarkable manner, the juice it distills being in taste and appearance like gravy from an excellent, broiled rump steak."

PROFESSOR CARTER, in his inaugural address before the British College of State Medicine, gave it as his opinion that every case of fever costs the community $10, and that the annual cost of scarlet fever in England is $2,000,000. When considering the question from this economic standpoint it may readily be understood that the cost of carrying out sanitary improvements and the labor of enforcing right methods of living would be far outweighed by the mere monetary saving which they would effect, without taking sentiment into consideration.

A MECHANICAL scarecrow has been invented. This new invention represents a man of "sportsmanlike" appearance standing with a gun in hand ready to fire at the first intruder. The arm holding the gun is made to move by clockwork, which is enclosed in a strong iron box at its feet, and at the proper elevation it fires a shot louder than an ordinary gun. After the report the arm lowers. The mechanism can be regulated at the owner's pleasure by a regulator like a clock, and only requires to be wound up twice a day. Mr. Wm. Maund, of Shobdon, Hereford, England, is the inventor.

A YOUNG lady of New York amuses herself with humming-birds as pets. They build their nests in the lace-curtains, and have raised little families in the parlor. There are plants for them to fly about in, and every day the florist sends a basket of flowers for them to extract the honey from. They are like little rainbows flying about the room, and they light on the head of their dainty mistress with perfect freedom. She has an especial affinity for the feathered race, and pigeons, canaries and bull-finches are included among her household favorites.

IN a paper by Dr. Arthur Ransome (English), entitled "Some Evidences Respecting Tubercular Infective Areas," attention is called to the frequency with which groups of several cases of deaths from consumption in one family occur in small, badly ventilated cottages situated on damp clay soils. It is dampness and want of ventilation that make a house or group of houses dangerous, and they probably do this, in large part at least, by causing or promoting slight inflammations of the air-passages, sore throats, bronchitis, etc., which lower the vitality of the tissues and so make them fit to support the tubercular bacilli.

THE most beautiful chamber ever seen was one recently fitted up by an English Duke for his bride. Her favorite flower is the daffodil, and it predominates in the decorations. The ceiling and the walls are of a pale, grayish green and gold. The fringe and dado are of dull-gold canvas silk, hand embroidered in white daffodils and narcissi. The chandeliers have for globes opaline glass on the same flower designs. The velvet carpet is gray-green, sprinkled with golden flowers. The furniture is of heavy English oak, carved with winged loves' heads, and the draperies and window hangings are of Spanish lace, in conventional designs of daffodils.

UP to date the last person who has made public a device for utilizing the current of Niagara is John. R Greene, of Oneonta, N Y., brother of the Rev. Dr. Rufus S. Greene, of Buffalo. His plan provides for a $25,000,000 tunnel from South Buffalo to the whirlpool, giving a fall of 210 feet here, and 320 at the lower terminus. Cross tunnels are included. It is estimated that 500,850 horse power would be provided, which, at a rental of $15, would yield $7,512,750 per annum. The subscriptions for the prize for the best device have reached the sum of $108,000. Erastus Wiman was the last signer.

AN experienced and highly respectable physician gave a valuable hint the other day which others may find a useful hint as I did, writes a correspondent. "I am convinced," said he, "not only from practical personal experience but on theoretically scientific grounds also, that a safeguard against much prevalent summer illness lies in the free use of lemon juice. Citric acid helps to supply the place of the fluids which are unduly dissipated through the pores of the skin in hot weather. Eat plenty of lemons, and you can stand the heat infinitely better than those who do not make use of the fruit which nature has supplied tropical countries."

QUEEN VICTORIA has been unusually successful this year in the sale of her yearlings. They went at an average price of 475 guineas apiece, and a very smart crowd gathered at Hampton Court to bid for them. The Duke of Portland drove his coach from town to the sale, and made the two biggest bids of the day, paying 2,600 and 1,500 guineas respectively for two of St. Simon's yearlings. Lord Randolph Churchill was on hand to bid, as were a lot of other distinguished individuals. Prince Henry of Battenberg did not have the luck of his royal mother-in-law. He sold two hunters at the same sale which fetched 55 and 30 guineas each.

THE gentleman who has just succeeded to the Earldom of Seafield, Scotland, went through some curious vicissitudes a few years ago. He was then in New Zealand, hard pushed to earn a livelihood, and he was acting as a bailiff in the New Zealand town of Oamaru, in 1884, when his father (the uncle of the earl he succeeded) became Earl of Seafield. The news was brought to the bailiff, who was at that moment "in possession" of a house in his official capacity, that he was now Viscount Reidhaven. A substitute was willing to take his place, but the bailiff viscount stuck to his post for other two days. Subsequently he stood for Parliament out there, but was not elected.

IN a recent article on Indian railroads and Indian wheat production, Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., who is a retired Liverpool cotton broker, makes a statement which possesses some interest for Canadian and American wheat-growers. "It is evident," he says, "that it is to England's interest to do what she can to develop the vast capabilities of India as a grower of wheat, since India accepts British goods in payment for her wheat without any tariff robbery. The cotton famine consequent upon the American civil war led us to encourage cotton-planting in India; and the hostile tariffs of such wheat-growing nations as the United States and Russia are in like manner hastening the day when India shall be the chief granary of the world."

THE deleterious effect of arsenic upon the skin was recently discussed in the Pathological Society of London, after a communication had been read by Mr. Jonathan Hutchinson. The skin is the tissue on which arsenic has perhaps its most marked influence. The poison may spoil the complexion instead of improving it by making it muddy and unsightly. A similar action is exhibited in all parts of the skin, and may lead to the development of soft corns, not warts, on the palms of the hands and soles of the feet, where a roughened condition also grows up under its influence. Mr. Hutchinson expressed the belief that arsenic can produce epithelial cancer.

THE proclamation of Christianity as the national religion of Japan will probably soon be made. The question, according to the Japan Weekly Mail, is now under discussion, and many of the leading publicists, statesmen and professors are taking an active part in the discussion. It is not claimed that Christian doctrine, in its purely religious side, is generally acceptable, but it is claimed that Christian civilization and Christian sentiment are gaining the mastery; that the old Japanese beliefs are dead or dying fast; that Japanese ethics are gradually giving place to Christian ethics, and that Christianity has, among other things, this in its favor—that it is the religion of the most highly civilized countries.

REPORTS from Brazil indicate that the freedmen have exhibited a steadiness and industry surprising to the most hopeful, and that many of them are in the employ of their former owners. Leading planters are employing greater numbers of laborers than they formerly owned slaves, are paying their employees fairly and treating them well, and making better profits under the free than the slave labor system. Malcontents among the former slave owners are said to be the only disturbing class, and whatever injurious results may follow the emancipation will, it is confidently stated, be due to these men rather than to the freedmen. The final act of emancipation has apparently been accompanied by much less disturbance than was to have been expected.

AS one result of the invasion scare, arrangements are being made at the British War Office for instructing gentlemen of influence in the counties of England and Scotland, and who are willing to accept the duty, to inquire into the extent and efficiency of local transport and equipment for the Volunteers under the mobilization scheme, and also as to the possibility of organizing in some way the many thousand Volunteers who have served a certain time in the ranks and have for various reasons ceased to be active, but who, if occasion should arise, would be willing to serve again. It is known that forty thousand men left the service voluntarily during last year only, and the whole number of such men fit for service has been estimated at over half a million.

The only medicine for woman's peculiar ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded, is DR. PIERCE'S FAVORITE PRESCRIPTION. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrappers, and faithfully carried out for many years.

THE OUTGROWTH OF A VAST EXPERIENCE.

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

A BOON TO WOMEN. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar diseases.

A POWERFUL TONIC. As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the uterus, or womb and its appendages, in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic. It promotes digestion and assimilation of food, cures nausea, weakness of stomach, indigestion, bloating and eructations of gas.

A SOOTHING NERVINE. As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system.

A MOTHER'S CORDIAL. In pregnancy, "Favorite Prescription" is a "mother's cordial," relieving nausea, weakness of stomach and other distressing symptoms common to that condition. If its use is kept up in the latter months of gestation, it so prepares the system for delivery as to greatly lessen, and many times almost entirely do away with the sufferings of that trying ordeal.

CURES THE WORST CASES. "Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhœa, or "whites," excessive flowing at monthly periods, painful menstruation, unnatural suppression, prolapsus or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation, and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

FOR THE KIDNEYS. "Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

TREATING THE WRONG DISEASE.

Many times women call on their family physicians, suffering, as they imagine, one from dyspepsia, another from heart disease, another from liver or kidney disease, another from nervous exhaustion, or prostration, another with pain here or there, and in this way they all present alike to themselves and their easy-going and indifferent, or over-busy doctor, separate and distinct diseases, for which he prescribes his pills and potions, assuming them to be such, when, in reality, they are all only symptoms caused by some womb disorder. The physician, ignorant of the cause of suffering, encourages his practice until large bills are made. The suffering patient gets no better, but probably worse by reason of the delay, wrong treatment and consequent complications. A proper medicine, like DR. PIERCE'S FAVORITE PRESCRIPTION, directed to the cause, would have entirely removed the disease, thereby dispelling all those distressing symptoms, and instituting comfort instead of prolonged misery.

3 PHYSICIANS FAILED. Mrs. E. F. MORGAN, of No. 71 Lexington St., East Boston, Mass., says: "Five years ago I was a dreadful sufferer from uterine troubles. Having exhausted the skill of three physicians, I was completely discouraged, and so weak I could with difficulty cross the room alone. I began taking Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and using the local treatment recommended in his 'Common Sense Medical Adviser.' I commenced to improve at once. In three months I was perfectly cured, and have had no trouble since. I wrote a letter to my family paper, briefly mentioning how my health had been restored, and offering to send the full particulars to any one writing me for them, and enclosing a stamped-envelope for reply. I have received over four hundred letters. In reply, I have described my case and the treatment used, and have earnestly advised them to 'do likewise.' From a great many I have received second letters of thanks, stating that they had commenced the use of 'Favorite Prescription,' had sent the $1.50 required for the 'Medical Adviser,' and had applied the local treatment so fully and plainly laid down therein, and were much better already."

A VOICE FROM CALIFORNIA. Mrs. ED. M. CAMPBELL, of Oakland, California, writes: "I had been troubled all my life with hysterical attacks and paroxysms, or spasms, and periodical recurrences of severe headache, but since I have been using your 'Favorite Prescription' I have had none of these. I also had womb complaint so bad that I could not walk two blocks without the most severe pain, but before I had taken your 'Favorite Prescription' two months, I could walk all over the city without inconvenience. All my troubles seem to be leaving me under the benign influence of your medicine, and I now feel smarter than for years before. My physicians told me that I could not be cured, and therefore you will please accept my everlasting thanks for what you have done for me, and may God bless you in your good works."

Later, she writes: "It is now four years since I took your 'Favorite Prescription,' and I have had no return of the female trouble I had then."

Retroverted Womb.—Mrs. EVA KOHLER, of Crab Orchard, Neb., writes: "Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has done me a great deal of good. I suffered from retroversion of the uterus, for which I took two bottles of the 'Favorite Prescription,' and I am now feeling like a different woman."

Doctors Failed.—Mrs. F. CORWIN, of Post Creek, N. Y., writes: "I doctored with three or four of the best doctors in these parts, and I grew worse until I wrote to you and began using your 'Favorite Prescription.' I used three bottles of it and two of the 'Golden Medical Discovery,' also one and a half bottles of the 'Purgative Pellets.' I can do my work and sew and walk all I care to, and am in better health than I ever expected to be in this world again. I owe it all to your wonderful medicines."

Well as I Ever Was.—Mrs. JOHN STEWART, of Chippewa Falls, Wis., writes: "I wish to inform you that I am as well as I ever was, for which I thank your medicines. I took four bottles of the 'Favorite Prescription' and one bottle of your 'Discovery' and four bottles of the 'Pellets.' All of the bad symptoms have disappeared. I do all my own work; am able to be on my feet all day. My friends tell me I never looked so well."

"That's What My Wife Says."

"How are all the folks?" asked Brown of Jones. "All well, except my wife," said Jones. "I'm worried about her. She tires out so easily; she complains of a backache about all the time, and is so low-spirited that she don't seem like herself at all." "My dear fellow," interrupted Brown, "I'll tell you exactly what she needs. My wife had the very same symptoms a few months ago, but to-day she is the healthiest woman in town. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription cured her, and it will cure Mrs. Jones, too. There's nothing on earth like it for the complaints to which the weaker sex are liable. That's what my wife says, and she knows." Guarantee to give satisfaction in every case, or money returned, printed on the bottle wrapper.

Bears for Buggy Horses.

Colonel Lamar Fontaine, of Canton, Miss., drives a pair of pet bears in a buggy. He has trained the animals himself and may be seen out behind his novel team every fine afternoon. The bears run at a sort of awkward trot and seem to take their position with the best possible good nature. They are, of course, muzzled.

Those who have Tried it Say

The best proof of the great power of Polson's NERVILINE over every kind of pain is obtained by the use of a 10 cent bottle. Nerviline requires no puffing; every bottle tells its own story. It cannot fail, for it is a combination of the most powerful pain-subduing remedies known to medical science. Nerviline is equally useful in external or internal pains. Try the great remedy. Ten cent bottle at any drug store. Large bottles only 25 cents.

A Hard-Working Girl.

Miss Tosa Jones, aged 18, of Argonia, Kan., has this season broken forty-five acres of ground and planted it in corn, and intends to cultivate it herself. She attends to the feeding of a large number of cattle every winter.

By supplying herself with the purest artesian well water, Memphis, Tenn., thinks she has broken the "best hold" of all contagious diseases.

JAPANESE HORSEWOMEN.

An Interesting Feature of the Spring Races in Tokio.

A Tokio letter says: The spring race have occupied the attention of the capital' upper and lower circles for the past thre days, and the sports and fashion model have paraded the lawn before the grand stand as they might at any race course in western countries. A feature of one day's entertainment was the riding of six Japanese ladies, and natives and foreigners were equally interested in the spectacle. Tokio is not behind other cities in a rage for riding schools, and in addition to the number of army officers and men who learned the foreign style abroad, every official or well-to-do citizen now aspires to lessons in equestrianism. There is a flourishing riding school near Shiba Park, and a number of Japanese ladies belong to the classes. They wear the foreign riding dress, and look well in the Amazonian habit, although a French tailor would groan at the outlines of their figures, that are largest at the waist, have no hips and the most sloping shoulders. The six Amazons who bounced in the saddle around the Uyeno race course the other afternoon mounted in the paddock, and the mounting was unique; bettos, or grooms, clasped their hands together like a cradle, the Amazons stepped on with both feet, and the betto slowly raised them straight up in the air until they reached the level of the saddle. The feat was entirely the betto's, and the man who holds the 100-pound dumbbell or plays with cannon balls hardly equals them.

"Doubting Thomases," remarked an eminent divine, "must exist in ratio to the too credulous." The habit of cautiousness is not, as a general thing, inborn, but is the result of a naturally generous and confiding nature repeatedly victimized by the cunning and crafty. So the many disappointments, and often injurious effects, arising from the use of various vaunted remedies have induced an undue cautiousness, and, in many cases, entire abandonment of the use of any. We call attention to the remedies of Dr. R. V. Pierce, of Buffalo, which physicians are employing in their practice with the most beneficial results. His "Golden Medical Discovery," for diseases of the lungs and kidneys, heart affections, fever and ague, dropsy, and all diseases of the blood, has never failed when put to the test.

An Unsatisfactory Brand.

Bolton—Young Jones is very generous with his cigars, isn't he?

Wolton—Yes (puff); but I think he would (puff) be kinder to his friends if he smoked them himself.

ITCHING PILES.

SYMPTOMS—Moisture; intense itching an stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form which often bleed and ulcerate, becomin very sore. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It equally efficacious in curing all Ski Diseases. DR. SWAYNE & SON, Proprietors, Philadelphia. SWAYNE'S OINTMENT can be obtained of druggists. Sent by mail for 50 cents.

It is said in London that Henry Irving, after defraying all the expenses connected with his recent tour in America, returned home with a net profit of $20,000.

The Shoe & Leather Reporter, N. Y., and Shoe & Leather Review, Chicago, the leading trade papers of the U.S. in the Hide line, have sent their representatives to investigate Mr. Page's business, and after a thorough examination and comparison the Reporter gives him this endorsement

"We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in his specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

DISEASES OF MAN.

M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,

THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,

Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines,

Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, diseases of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, innutrition, emaciation, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible habit, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of untold lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. LUBON'S Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Man. Sealed and secure from observation. Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

MILL BURNED.—Mr. James Smith's shingle mill at Elba was destroyed by fire about 3 o'clock on Saturday morning. It is not known how the fire originated. Loss estimated at $1,000; no insurance. —[Shelburne Free Press.

KILLED BY A TREE.—While Mr. Schilling of North Bentinck was cutting a tree in the woods on Saturday last a falling tree struck him and killed him instantly. The funeral of the young man aged about 21 years, took place on Monday.—[Grey Review.

A Keppel woman fell into Mud Lake and when she was rescued a ten pound pike was entangled in her bustle. Her husband wanted to set her again, but she objected and there is trouble in the house every time the husband is asked to provide meat for dinner.—[Chatsworth News.

The eldest son of Mr Benj. Wood, so well known as a Teacher in this section of country, was killed by diving off a wharf near Parkdale last week. The age of deceased was 21. The water was much lower than last year, and in diving deceased struck his head upon a rock.—[Grey Review.

A TELEGRAM was received on Tuesday by the friends of Mr. Jas. Kelly, of Egremont, who has been lately working as fireman, on a railroad in Minnesota, that he had been killed. His relatives in Egremont have sent for his body which will likely arrive here the latter part of this week.—[Mt. Forest Representative.

A four year old child of John Montgomery that was visiting at Mr. Cooper's near Ventry was kicked on the forehead by a horse last Tuesday, breaking the bone near the eye. Medical attendance was secured and the wound attended to. The child is making as satisfactory progress as possible considering the seriousness of the cut.—[Dundalk Herald.

About 10 o'clock last Friday night, Mr. Calhoun's barn, on the 11th of Elderslie, was discovered to be on fire. The family had not retired to bed and were soon upon the scene but not in time to save anything. A two-year old calf was burned to death notwithstanding the efforts that were made to save it. Cause of fire unknown. Insurance $200.—[Chesley Enterprise.

One evening last week a sad drowning accident occured at what is known as Rusk's lake on the 10th con. of Elderslie. A young man named John Grey and several small boys got on to an old raft which they jumped off after getting a short distance from the shore. Grey could not swim and was therefore unable to reach the shore. His body was recovered about an hour afterwards.—[Chesley Enterprise.

On Sunday, July 1st, one of the oldest inhabitants of Southampton, in the person of Mr. David Culbert, ended this life at the age of 70 years. The deceased was one of the oldest printers in the country, having started the first newspaper ever printed in the County of Bruce, called the Saugeen Pioneer, which was established at Southampton in 1856.—[Mt. Forest Confederate.

ACCIDENT.—While Mr. Jas McGillivray, of 3rd con. N. D. R. Glenelg, was raking hay with a sulky rake on Monday the horse started to run and threw him off. He fell on the hard ground and had his colar bone and three ribs broken besides receiving a very bad shaking up generally, Dr. Jamieson attended the injured man, and expects him to recover soon.—[Grey Review.

CLOSE CALL.—Robert Fawcett, of Euphrasia, was driving with horse and buggy on Wednesday, 4th inst., and while crossing the railway between Berkeley and Holland Center was struck by a passing train. The horse escaped injury; the buggy was smashed to atoms and Mr. F. almost killed. He was taken to Dr. Halsted's when it was found that the patient had a rib broken over the heart, was badly bruised about the head and shoulder and otherwise severely shook up. He is, however, improving and will be about shortly.—[Markdale Standard.

A Newtonville Item.

A large number of parents and friends of the S. S. schools assembled in the Methodist church on Sunday in response to an invitation given by the teachers and officers, to attend the quarterly review. Short addresses were delivered by the Rev. D. C. McDowell, Messrs. Ritch and Reid, after which the review was taken up by the superintendent, Mr. F. A. Leitch. The children entered heartily into the answering of the questions as they were brought out, with remarkable promptness, which spoke well for the teachers, and in fact the S. S. is to be commended in general for its appearance, and the excellent behavior of the scholars. —[Orono News.

[Rev. Mr. McDowell mentioned in the foregoing item was a very esteemed pastor of the Methodist church here some years ago. He was elected President of the Guelph Conference in 1885.—ED. ADVANCE.]

Bad Boys in Flesherton.

There are several pretty bad boys in Flesherton, who will have to be brought up with a sudden jerk if their parents or guardians do not wish to see them secure lodgings at the expense of the public. The worst of these boys could be counted on one hand. Several of them recently broke the Editor's boat away from its moorings and have since paddled it about on the pond pretty much as they pleased. The boat was locked at the time. Firing stones on the streets, stealing fruit, and throwing rotten eggs into springs of water, are also among their numerous pastimes. Boys, stop! or else look out for squalls. We mean business. If you want to use the boat, come and ask us for it.

That Drain.

The attention of the Commissioner for Ward No. 3 is directed to the drain at the East side of Mr. Flesher's Park. Private parties have gone to the expense of completing it as far as Flesher's Mill Reserve, and now ask the Council to continue it on to the Boyne. The matter requires immediate attention and will not cost more than $12 or $15.

Destructive Fire.

About half past four o'clock last Friday morning, the 20th, inst., Mr. Robert J. Carson was aroused from sleep by the crackling noise of the burning timbers of his dwelling-house. He opened the door, but a rush of flames compelled him to close it. The entire east side of the building was enveloped in flames. The only means of exit was by two small windows in a "lean-to" on the west side of the main building. By the time the members of the family were placed out of danger, the flames had spread with such rapidity that there was no opportunity to save the household effects beyond a few trifling articles—the entire family left without either shoe or stocking and only a few scanty articles of wardrobe. No insurance. The origin of the fire is a mystery. The cooking stove stood in a cook-house at the north-east corner of the main building and there was no fire in it after five o'clock on Thursday evening. Mrs. Carson's son had been from home and returned about twelve o'clock and Mrs. C. was in the cook-house some time later and no sign of fire.

Our deepest sympathy is tendered Mr. Carson and his family in their loss. This is a case in which Christian philanthrophy might find scope for exercise.

Horse Thief Sentenced.

George W. Potter, alias Beard, the ungrateful employe of T. Moffatt & Sons, Markdale, whose decamping with the horse and harness belonging to the former was noticed in THE ADVANCE last week, was tried before Judge Lane at Owen Sound on Saturday. Accused pleaded guilty to taking the horse and outfit and selling them to Mr. Whitten, of Flesherton, from which place he went to Dundalk, where George Noble captured him. The prisoner seemed to feel his position keenly, and protested that he never meant to become a vulgar horse thief. He had merely fallen in a moment of temptation. The Judge imposed a sentence of 23 months in the Central Prison. Thereupon, Potter earnestly pleaded to be sent to the Penetentiary. He asserted that while occupying a good position in Toronto last year, he had visited the Central Prison as an evangelist, and urged that it would be very humiliating to him now to sojourn in the establishment as a horse thief. He would much rather prefer to go to Kingston, for in the penal establishment there his brother was a guard and it might be that under his influence he would become a better man. Indeed, he would rather take 2 years in the Penetentiary than 23 months in the Central. The Judge acceded to the request and re-sentenced the prisoner to 2 years in Kingston. It is highly probable that the reason why Potter preferred to go to the Penetentiary instead of to the Central Prison, was the well-known fact that in the last named institution the work is heavier and the fare lighter than in Kingston.

Excelsior Bag Scale.

Messrs. Abercrombie & Marshall, of Griersville, are out with the neatest thing in the shape of an automatic bag-holder and scale combined, we have ever seen. The "Excelsior Bag Scale," as it is called, is designed for farmers, business men and others having to weigh grain or other product in bags, and is a most useful invention. No farmer, who appreciates the value of a labor-saving apparatus such as this, will be without an Excelsior Bag Scale. It is sure to sell like "hot cakes." Messrs. Abercrombie & Marshall are the proprietors as well as the patentees of this invention and are now selling Township and County rights.

Another Markdale Item.

One genial friend, the License Inspector for East Grey, paid his usual weekly visit to Markdale on Monday, in time for the meeting held in Mr. Marsh's roller skating rink, with Mr. Wm. Brown, J.P. in the chair. The audience not very large but quite interested in the proceedings. The first case on the list was the smiling wine and beer License hotel-keeper at Eugenia. The Inspector said a few words to him, and Mr. Hoy apologized for not putting in his appearance a week sooner, saying he had taken some other people's advice. The L. Inspector exhibited some very small phials, two with the pure alchohol and the other two with the residue examined by an expert. Of course Mr. H. apologized and said he would pay the fine, and asked that it be made as light as possible. The next case on the list was Mrs. C., but for the time being the Inspector's "lady friend" had skipped out. She was partly represented by a legal gentleman from the village of Dundalk. The Inspector and his legal friend had a few words, the legal gentleman wanting the former to change his information. It was then decided to adjourn the Court for half an hour for legal refreshments. When the Court resumed, the Inspector was firm and would not change his information. The Inspector seems to be an early riser, as he was observed looking for telephone communication, or something else, early next morning at the Markdale station. He was next seen making his way towards the capital, supposed to be after information as to the price paid for boarding lady visitors at the Owen Sound summer resort.

A. F. & A. M.

Next year, according to the vote of the Grand Lodge in Toronto last week, the Grand Lodge of Canada, A. F. & A. M., will be held in Owen Sound. The visit of this large and influential body to Grey County is largely due to Judge Macpherson, who is an enthusiastic craftsman and stands high in the esteem of his brethren. An earnest endeavor was made to get the next session of the Grand Lodge held in Ottawa, but Judge Macpherson ably combatted the proposition and Owen Sound was selected by a very large majority.

Why You Feel

So weak and exhausted is because your blood is impure. As well expect the sanitary condition of a city to be perfect with defiled water and defective sewerage, as to expect such a complicated piece of mechanism as the human frame to be in good order with impure blood circulating even to its minutest veins. Do you know that every drop of your two or three gallons of blood passes through the heart and lungs in about two and a half minutes, and that on its way, it makes bone and muscle, brain and nerve, and all other solids and fluids of the body? The blood is the great nourisher, or, as the Bible terms it,

"The Life of the Body."

Is it any wonder, then, that if the blood be not pure and perfect in its constituents, you suffer so many indescribable symptoms?

Ayer's Sarsaparilla stands "head and shoulders" above every other Alterative and Blood Medicine. As proof, read these reliable testimonies

G. C. Brock, of Lowell, Mass., says: "For the past 25 years I have sold Ayer's Sarsaparilla. In my opinion, the best remedial agencies for the cure of all the diseases arising from impurities of the blood are contained in this medicine."

Eugene I. Hill, M. D., 81 Sixth Ave., New York, says: "As a blood-purifier and general builder-up of the system, I have never found anything to equal Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It gives perfect satisfaction."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla proves equally efficacious in all forms of Scrofula, Boils, Carbuncles, Eczema, Humors, Lumbago, Catarrh, &c.; and is, therefore, the very best

Spring and Family Medicine

in use. "It beats all," says Mr. Cutler, of Cutler Brothers & Co., Boston, "how

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

does sell." Prepared by

Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.

Price $1; Six bottles, $5. Worth $5 a bottle.

A Friend in Need.

Gin ye find a heart that's weary,
And that sae dis a brither's han',
Dinna thou turn frae it, dearie,
Thou mann help thy fellow-man.
Thou, too, hast a hidden heartache,
Sacred from all mortal ken,
And because in thine own grief's sake
Thou mann feel for ither men.

Gin there's one 'gainst whom unkindly
Scorn has bent her bitter blows,
Dinna thou join in an' blindly
Lend thy doubts to swell his woes.
Thou may'st feel the lash o' slander,
Know the stings o' falsehood too,
Dinna stop to wait and wonder
If the thing be false or true.

Give thy hand while hands are needed,
Give thy trust while trust is scant,
The sma' gifts are doubly heeded
When they come in time o want.
Pity's blind and faith is blinder,
Hand in hand the brithers go;
Hope is kind, but love is kinder,
Dearie, thou wilt find it so.

Thou wilt find some errors ever,
'Stead a gird may reap but ill;
Wisdom errs, but pity never,
Trust misplaced is trusting still.
Though thy faith be torn in sunder,
Wisdom pity's power divide,
Heaven will sure forgive thy blunder,
Since it leans to virtue's side.

In this worl' o' seesaw, dearie,
Grief goes up and joy comes down,
Brows that catch the sunshine cheerie
May to-morrow wear a frown.
Bleak December, dull and dreary,
Follows on the heels o' May,
Give thy trust unstinted, dearie,
Thou mayst need a friend some day.

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

"How provoking you are, Guy!"

"So you have already told me."

"It will not lose by repetition. Do you know, or do you not know, Guy?"

"Know what?"

"Who—who the lady is whom Mr. Ross likes."

"I know several ladies he likes."

Madge stamped her little foot angrily, and snatched away her hand from Guy's clasp.

"You are unbearable!" she said petulantly; and Major Stuart hid a smile under his heavy mustache, but said nothing.

There was a minute's silence; then Madge came slowly back to Guy's side, and slipped her hand through his arm, looking up with a coaxing air of entreaty into his face.

"Forgive me, Guy; I am a cross, rude girl."

"Are you?" he said, smiling as he looked down at her.

"Yes—and—Guy, dear old Guy, you will tell me, will you not?"

"Tell you what, you little witch?" he said, smiling, although his eyes were dim at the recollection how often Shirley had come to his side and slipped her hand through his arm in the same coaxing, entreating manner.

"What I want to know, Guy dear; do tell me quickly. Mamma is coming."

"What do you want to know?"

"Ah, you know! Guy, don't be so unkind!"

"You want to know with whom Ross is in love. Would it not be a breach of confidence to tell you?"

"I would tell nobody, Guy, I promise you."

"You are quite, quite sure?"

"Quite," said Madge earnestly.

"But suppose I am not in his confidence?"

Madge half drew away her hand, then put it back again.

"Ah, but he has surely told you!"

"Now, Madgie, do you suppose for a moment or for a half a moment, that he came to me and told me in so many words, 'I am in love with So-and-so'?"

"Of course not; but you have guessed."

"I did guess."

"Ah, then tell me!"

"Suppose you guess, Madgie?" he answered, looking down into the fair pleading eger face with an indulgent smile.

"But I can not; I don't know her perhaps."

"Oh, yes, you do—you have met her!"

"Where? Here, or at Cotsford?"

"Here, and at Cotsford."

Madge looked puzzled.

"Nt Rosie Venn?"

"N," Guy answered gravely.

"Mss Grayling? No? Then who can it be? If Lady Fairholme had been here, or were not married, I should say it was she."

"But she has not been here, and she is married."

"I give it up, Guy," Madge said, coloring a little under his scrutiny.

"Do you? Let me see; who can it be? It must be some one on the premises, Madge. It is not Lady Oliphant, let us hope; and he has not seen this pretty school-mistress, and Mrs. Ford is rather old and plump - and—Madgie"—he had dropped his bantering tone now, and was looking at her with grave tenderness—"have you guessed? Yes, I see you have. Well, is it a very hopeless business, dear?"

Madge was hanging her head to hide her blushes, and the little hand lying on Guy's arm was a trifle unsteady.

"Is it, Madgie?"

"Why should it be, Guy?" she whispered.

Jack, poor fellow, thinks it is, because the girl whom he loves is a great heiress, and he is comparatively a poor man."

"Does that make any difference, Guy?"

"It makes a vast difference in the eyes of many people, dear; and Jack fears that the lady of his love will despise him for a fortune-hunter."

"Ah, no—ah, no!" Madge said eagerly. "How can he love her if he thinks so meanly of her?"

"I knew her better," Guy answered, smiling. "So his cause is not hopeless after all, and he need not go away! See—here are the carriages," he added as he went forward to meet Lady Oliphant; and Jack came to help Madge into the break, her blushing face lovelier than ever with the new sweetness it gained during the last few minutes.

CHAPTER XLV.

"I am bound on a very disagreeable errand," said Lady Oliphant, sighing as Major Stuart turned the ponies' heads down the road in rear of the break.

"Indeed! I am sorry. What is it?" he asked, looking at her sympathetically.

"You know Mrs. Grant, the school-mistress, whom Madge goes into such raptures over?" Lady Oliphant rejoined. "And indeed I was just as bad as Madge about her myself," she added.

"Yes; her name is familiar in my ears as household words," said Guy, smiling. "The child's enthusiasm on the subject was quite amusing."

"Yes; she took the greatest fancy to her, and conceived quite an affection for her"—and Lady Oliphant sighed. "And now I fear the poor child will suffer for my imprudence in allowing her to associate with a person who is evidently not a fit companion for her."

"How is that?" Major Stuart said, with some interest. "Have you discovered anything to Mrs. Grant's discredit?"

"I am afraid we have. Indeed all the village is talking of her conduct, and our rector, Mr. Venn, who was at first as delighted with her as we could possibly be, called at the Hall yesterday about it."

"Does she ill treat these children?" Guy asked somewhat absently—he was apparently, more interested in the behavior of the two young people in the break before him than in Mrs. Grant's.

"Oh, no, she is most kind and patient, and indeed I was quite charmed with the way they are getting on!"

"Then what has she been doing?"

"All kinds of things, to judge from the village gossip. Mr. Litton, Dr. Lloyd's assistant, is constantly at her cottage, by day and night—professionally, he says; but a woman who is well enough to continue her duties as school-mistress can not need so much medical advice."

"And she has no relative living with her who could need his service?"

"No; she lives quite alone, and at Christmas she dismissed her servant, saying she preferred to live so. Indeed, it is only within the last few weeks that these rumors have been flying about."

"But Mr. Litton is an unmarried man," suggested Major Stuart, with a smile, "and Mrs. Grant is a very pretty woman, I hear; so that I am afraid it must be a case of what Artemus Ward would call 'affinity.' It would not be such a very wonderful thing for them to fall in love with each other, Lady Oliphant."

"Not at all," she agreed promptly. "But Mr. Litton was almost engaged to Rosie Venn before this scandal; and the rector has sent Rosie away on a visit, the poor child was grieving so much about it."

"But why does not some one take Mr. Litton to task?" said Major Stuart. "If his intentions are honorable, he will not hesitate to say so, and if it is only a flirtation, he ought to be told that he is seriously compromising a solitary woman's reputation, and that he ought to desist."

"But Mr. Litton's visits are not the only thing we have to complain of," continued Lady Oliphant, who would have been glad to arouse her own anger against the school-mistress before reaching her cottage, in order to be able to speak to her with firmness and decision, although she knew that one glance of Shirley's hazel eyes would upset all her proposed speeches and make her compassionate toward her poor erring sister.

"So many other strange things have been said about Mrs. Grant, Guy. She has been seen—my husband himself saw her—coming out of a public-house on two occasions, and they say other, even worse things of her in the village."

"And Madge has been intimate with such a person?" said Guy, with involuntary displeasure.

"I am grieved to say so," answered Lady Oliphant, sighing. "She used to go to her constantly, and Mrs. Grant gave her music-lessons, and we thought—Sir Frederic and I—that the child was greatly improved since she saw so much of Mrs. Grant, who is a perfectly well-mannered woman, extremely graceful, and, I should think, a lady by birth."

"But you had references with her, surely?"

"No," Lady Oliphant said simply. "I am almost ashamed to own it; but we had none. We took her on trust. I will tell you all about it," she added, as they drove on. "It is rather a romantic little story."

And as they drove slowly up the hill, she told him, in as few words as she could, how they had succored the poor young widow who had lain down by the road-side to die; and Guy listened with an interest and attention which pleased her ladyship.

"And this is how long ago, Lady Oliphant?" he said, in a quick, eager voice.

"Just as you went abroad. Don't you remember driving with us to the lodge?"

"Yes, I remember," Guy said slowly, his face full of grave thoughtfulness and with an eager look in his eyes, which showed that he was searching back into the past; but the momentary eagerness had left his eyes when he spoke again, and it seemed as if some glimmer of hope which had brightened them had died away.

"Would you describe Mrs. Grant to me?" he said quietly.

"I would take you in to see her only I am going on such a disagreeable errand," she answered smiling. "Ah, if you saw her, you would not be surprised at Mr. Litton's infatuation! She is very lovely: no words can be too warm in praise of her beauty, and whatever Madge has told you on the subject can hardly have been exaggerated."

"Madge has contented herself by telling me that she is the most beautiful person in the world," Guy said laughingly. "But that description is not very graphic. Is she a blonde or a brunette?"

"Neither, for she has chestnut hair, the sweetest eyes with jet-black brows and lashes, and a fair complexion. She has a perfect figure, and moves most gracefully."

"And—and her voice. Is it such as Shakspeare would call an excellent thing in woman?" Guy said, trying to disguise his anxiety under an appearance of carelessness.

"It is such a pretty voice," she answered too much absorbed in her own thoughts to heed the eagerness in his manner, "very low and sweet, with a little tremor in it sometimes. Ah, the cottage is in sight! And there is Mr. Litton's horse waiting."

Sir Frederic, from the box-seat of the break, glanced back at his wife as his eyes fell upon the big bay horse fastened to the school-house railings; but at the same moment Mr. Litton came out of the cottage, closed the door after him with the air of an habitue, swung himself into the saddle, and rode down the hill toward them.

"Oh, papa, there is Mr. Litton! Please stop. I want to inquire after Mrs. Grant. He has been to the cottage, and she must be ill," cried Madge eagerly; and Sir Frederic pulled up his horse, and Guy followed suit.

Mr. Litton rode up, looking graver and paler than his wont, lifting his hat to Lady Oliphant.

"You have been to the school-house," said Madge eagerly. "Mrs. Grant is not ill, I hope?"

"She is not very well," he answered, smiling at her; "but there is no need for anxiety, Miss Oliphant."

"May I go in and see her?" Madge asked, when her father interposed.

"As your mother is going to see her this morning, it will be better for you to put off your visit, Madge. It is not infectious, doctor, I presume?"

"What is not infectious?" asked Mr. Litton, looking up in surprise; but Sir Frederic's face was impassive.

"Mrs. Grant's illness," he answered coolly.

"Infectious. Mrs. Grant's illness?" the young man answered looking bewildered; then suddenly recollecting himself, he added quickly, "Oh, dear, no, certainly not! She is a little overtired, I think—that is all."

"Then she ought not to be troubled with visitors," said Sir Frederic. "We won't detain you, Mr. Litton. I suppose you are busy just now?"

"Pretty well, Sir Frederic," the young surgeon replied, as he lifted his hat once more and rode away. Guy Stuart looked after him keenly. Young, handsome, graceful, it was no wonder that he should attract a woman's love; but, if—

Guy's train of thoughts was suddenly cut short by Sir Frederic drawing up again at the school-house to say a few words to his wife; and then the break drove on, the girl's pretty blue eyes looking wistfully at the cottage windows.

"There must be some good in her to have won such a love as that," Guy thought, as he helped Lady Oliphant to alight; and, while she knocked at the cottage door, he looked eagerly to see who would open it.

But she knocked twice without receiving any answer; and then, trying the latch and finding it unfastened, she entered the cottage.

"I will not keep you long, Guy," she said, with a smile; and, entering the little passage as she spoke, she met the school-mistress coming down-stairs with a cup and saucer in her hand. Had she been one moment sooner Guy Stuart's curiosity would have been satisfied; but in that moment Lady Oliphant shut the door, and so prevented his seeing the woman whose description had so greatly interested him.

"Lady Oliphant!" Mrs. Grant exclaimed her hands trembling so much the cup and saucer rattled against each other, and she could barely retain her grasp of them.

"Yes. I am rather an early visitor; but I want to say a few words to you, Mrs. Grant."

In perfect silence the school-mistress preceded Lady Oliphant into the little sitting-room. There was no fire, and the chill and comfortless aspect of the room struck her ladyship with a sense of forlorn desolation, which pained her; while the figure of the woman who stood facing her with great sad eyes, which had an expression of unutterable misery in their depths, seemed in keeping with the room. She was dressed, as usual, in black, but her attire had not the dainty freshness and neatness which generally characterized it; the beautiful chestnut hair was in disorder, and she wore a large apron as if she had been engaged in housework.

Lady Oliphant did not sit down; and Shirley stood facing her with an air of deprecating sadness and humility which her ladyship could not help regarding as a tacit confession of guilt; but there was something about the slim black-robed figure, with its pale lovely face and pathetic eyes, which touched Madge's mother against her better judgment, and made her task a more difficult one than it had appeared even in anticipation.

"Mrs. Grant," she said—and, despite all her efforts to render it stern, her pleasant voice trembled slightly—"what I have to say to you this morning is very painful to me—so painful, indeed, that I can not think that it will hurt you more to hear than it pains me to say it; but I am forced to do so."

Mrs. Grant made no answer; but into the great sad eyes came a look of intense dread and shrinking terror, and the color faded from the sweet lips, leaving them ashly pale.

"Will you not sit down?" Lady Oliphant said suddenly. "You do not look well. I fear your duties are too much for you."

"No, oh, no!" the school-mistress said very eagerly. "They are not indeed. I can perform them quite easily. Pray do not think otherwise."

"And yet you are under constant medical care," said her ladyship a trifle more coldly; and a great wave of color rose in the pale face, then, fading, left it colorless as before.

"Mr. Litton is here frequently, I understand," continued Lady Oliphant, "and you can be his only patient here."

The fear in the lustrous hazel eyes deepened.

"Yes," she said faintly.

"Then how can you be equal to your duties?" said Lady Oliphant more gently.

"There is nothing the matter with me which would prevent my fulfilling them," was the slow, pleading answer. "I have been exact and punctual, and have neglected none of them since—since—"

Her voice failed, and her head sunk forward on her breast.

"I am complaining of no neglect, Mrs. Grant. I have never had greater reason to be satisfied than at present, which makes me regret all the more bitterly being obliged to dismiss you."

"To dismiss me!" She looked up in sudden terror as she uttered the words; then after a moment's pause, she said brokenly and tremulously, "Oh, Lady Oliphant, you do not mean to do that!"

"It is with great—the greatest reluctance that I am forced to do so; but I have no alternative."

"No alternative!" she repeated mechanically, looking at Lady Oliphant with dazed, bewildered, frightened eyes, which seemed to see an executioner in the gentle lady in velvet and furs.

"None."

A silence followed—a silence so complete that it seemed to have some effect on Mrs. Grant's nerves. She glanced around her fearfully, as if she were afraid of hearing some sound in the house or seeing some apparition; but she could not force her parched and trembling lips to speak; and Lady Oliphant went on gently—

"Mrs. Grant," she said, a little unsteadily, "I do not think I need explain to you my reasons for doing this. It costs me so much, and it will give my daughter so much pain, that I should not have done it without being forced to do so."

"But I do not understand, Lady Oliphant," Mrs. Grant faltered tremulously. "Why should you send me away?"

"Your ignorance must be feigned, Mrs. Grant"—there was a little sternness now in the lady's voice. "You cannot conscientiously tell me that you are ignorant of my reasons for dismissing you."

"I am quite ignorant," the school-mistress answered more steadily; and her manner vexed Lady Oliphant.

"You are a young woman, Mrs. Grant; but you are not so unversed in the ways of the world as to imagine that such conduct as yours has not been noticed in the village."

"My conduct!" echoed Mrs. Grant, lifting her head with a momentary flash of haughty resentment.

"Yes, your conduct in allowing Mr. Litton to visit you so frequently, and at any hour which suited his convenience. Do you deny that he has been seen leaving the cottage at night, and that you have been seen walking with him at hours when an action at other times harmless, becomes a perfect impropriety? He comes here, it would appear, three or four times in the course of the day and night, and his visits have given rise to a great deal of talk in the village."

"He is a doctor," the school-mistress said faltering.

"Yes; but you are not in such need of his professional services; and there can be only one construction put upon his visits here."

"And what is that?" Mrs. Grant said vaguely.

"That he is your lover."

A peal of shrill hysterical laughter broke from Mrs. Grant's white lips, laughter which was terrible to hear, and which rang through the quiet room, startling Lady Oliphant out of her calm self-possession.

"My lover," Mrs. Grant repeated in a moment—"my lover!"

"Yes," Lady Oliphant answered gravely. "The supposition is a very natural one; and if Mr. Litton's intention toward you were honorable, no one could oppose your reception of him; but he himself has told Dr. Lloyd that he has no thought of marriage, and—"

Again the shrill bitter laughter broke forth.

"Of marriage with me?" the school-mistress said, with a strange expression on the lovely white face. "No, he certainly has not!"

"Then, why does he come here?"

"He comes here professionally," was the almost sullen answer.

"That is absurd! And this is a very useless discussion," said her ladyship angry now, and incensed. "We will settle it. As soon as you can make it convenient to do so, Mrs. Grant, you will leave—"

"As soon as," Mrs. Grant began, then her voice failed her for a moment; the next she went on huskily—"Lady Oliphant, I entreat you, do not send me away. Indeed—indeed I have done nothing wrong! Oh, will you not trust me a little longer?"

"How can I trust you, Mrs. Grant? You have already abused my confidence; you cannot have forgotten how, without reference, or any knowledge of you—"

"I have not abused your confidence—I have done nothing wrong. Lady Oliphant, if you have any pity, do not ask me to leave the cottage now. I cannct—I dare not face the winter—oh, think—to be houseless and desolate in such weather!"

"Mrs. Grant, you are paining me terribly," Lady Oliphant said unsteadily. "I have no wish but to be just with you; but really Sir Frederic is exceedingly annoyed at the scandal which has troubled the village for some weeks. Do you know that Miss Venn, to whom Mr. Litton was paying attention, has been obliged to be sent away for a time, she fretted so much at Mr. Litton's visits here? Indeed I cannot tell you how much has been said, nor is it necessary."

"But, Lady Oliphant"—the sweet broken voice was husky and strained, and the little trembling hands were held out in passionate supplication—"do not send me away now. Oh, I cannot go! It is impossible—oh, be pitiful!—trust me a little while. I may only have to ask your forbearance for a very little while; but, in mercy, grant it me."

Lady Oliphant shook her head sadly; Sir Frederic's injunctions had been imperative, and she could not disobey them; but her heart ached for the agony and despair on the pleading face.

"What can I do, Mrs. Grant? You do not justify yourself. You cannot refute the accusations, and I cannot let them pass unnoticed."

Mrs. Grant fell upon her knees, and caught at Lady Oliphant's dress entreatingly.

"For the love of Heaven do not leave me thus!" she implored, with anguished gestures and wild miserable eyes. "Oh, for the love of Heaven, take back your decision! If it were only I who had to suffer, but—oh, if you have one grain of charity, of compassion in your heart, have pity upon me now! I have done nothing wrong. I—oh, Heaven, have mercy upon me!"

Her head sank forward in a voiceless agony of supplication; the little hand still clung desperately to the velvet fur of Lady Oliphant's cloak, which that lady was trying to disengage from her clasp.

"No, no. I will not rise. You shall not go until you tell me that I need not go," cried the school-mistress wildly. "Oh, if you knew—if I could tell you—if I could trust you—oh, have pity, have pity!"

Her voice died away in a wail of pain—low, faint, despairing. Lady Oliphant lifted her to her feet; and she stood looking at her with dim eyes, panting and exhausted from her passionate excitement.

"My poor child," her ladyship said tremulously, "you are paining me beyond all words. Let this cease now. I will see you again. You must try to think it over calmly. Believe me, I am only doing what I conceive to be my duty, and I will do anything in my power to help you to another home."

"It is not for that; it is not for my sake," Shirley said pitifully; "but it would kill—What am I saying?" she added, pressing her hands to her forehead with a troubled gesture, "What am I saying?"

"I am afraid so much excitement will make us both ill," Lady Oliphant said nervously, now anxious only to end the interview. "I must leave you, and you must try not to distress yourself more than you can help. Do you not think you had better let me send some assistance for your household work?" she added, glancing at the fireless grate.

"Oh, no—oh, no!" Mrs. Grant answered, trying to be calm. "I do not need it, and—and I have a fire upstairs."

"Do you sleep upstairs then? Surely the next room is warmer!"

"Yes," was the faltering answer; and, as Lady Oliphant, with a little gesture of farewell, passed out of the cottage, the young school-mistress sunk on her knees by the table and covered her face in a silent agony of tearless sobs, which shook her slender frame like a reed shaken by the wind.

"What shall I do?" she moaned presently, rising and pacing to and fro in the little room. "It would kill him; and yet, if they insist, of course I cannot resist. Oh, Heaven, help us! What are we to do? Where can we go? Even Mr. Litton has suffered for his goodness to us. Ah, he was very good indeed not to betray us, and rather let himself be misunderstood by the girl he loves! I bring misery everywhere; but some day I will go to Miss Venn and tell her, and he'll be happy. I must write to Jack—I must write to Jack."

She broke off restlessly, and stood silent for a moment; then she went into the inner room, bathed her face with cold water, and smoothed the soft, chestnut hair.

"He must not see me so distressed," she said, with a pitiful, little smile.

"And I am never safe from interruption. Oh, I am so tired!" she added, with a long, heavy sigh. "My limbs ache with fatigue, and yet I must not be ill—I dare not be ill."

It was pitiful to see how she tried to be cheerful and to efface the marks of weariness and sleeplessness which were so evident on her face. She went slowly back to the sitting-room, and, even as she had done on Christmas-day, she took out writing-materials to address her brother; but now the letter would have to be sent to Erindale Hall. Drawing up a chair to the table, she sat down; but the heart-weariness overcame her, and her head sunk forward on her arms in an agony of low, pitiful weeping, which, although it exhausted her, eased the burning brain to which the relief of tears was a merciful one.

How long she lay there she did not know; she felt no chill, although the room was cold; nor did she hear the sound of heavy, firm footsteps on the little brick-paved path at her door; but the door opened quietly, and, when a gentle touch upon her bowed head made her start up in alarm, she met the earnest, pitying, compassionate, gray eyes which had once made her all sunshine, but which now she would have died rather than meet.

"Guy!" The white lips parted to utter his name, yet no sound came from them; but he guessed the word.

"Yes," he said very gently. "Shirley, it is Guy!"

Useful Antidotes.

As a rule, there is in every household and factory, or at least within easy reach, simple and effective antidotes, writes a New York correspondent. These remedies are of infinite value. Warm water and mustard can always be got, as can also sweet oil, butter or lard. For poisoning by bug poisons, blue vitriol, mercury, lead water, saltpetre, sulphate of zinc or like substances, milk or white of eggs in large quantities is always to be commended.

For poisons like rough on rats, Paris green and Fowler's solution of arsenic, one should tickle the fauces of the victim with a feather, or induce vomiting by copious draughts of salt and water, which should be followed by good-sized doses of sweet oil or milk.

Where oil vitriol, muriatic or oxalic acid is the poison, one can easily help matters by scraping some plaster from the wall and dissolving it in water and make the patient drink it. Soap dissolved in water is also good in these cases. When caustic poisons are taken, then water and vinegar, or lemon juice and water should be given.

Many suicides seek the desired end by means of carbolic acid. In such cases give the person drinks of a glutinous character. Flour and water, for instance, is especially desirable.

For chloroform, chloral and such things, douse the head, chest and face with cold water and keep working the arms to promote artificial respiration.

Laudanum, morphine and opium are also in great favor with suicides. Induce vomiting and give all the strong coffee you can get down them. And so I might go on. All these things I have named, you will see, are nearly always at hand and can be employed with good results, if only until the doctor comes. They are things the police ought to know at any rate.

Nilsson's Debut.

Writing of Mme. Nilsson-Miranda's farewell concert, Dr. Louis Engel says in the World, of London: "Never shall I forget the sensation created by the young Swedish girl at the Theatre Lyrique, in Paris, and how within one week the name of Christine Nilsson was in everybody's mouth. She who began to sing in the street with her little brother, proud of the receipts of her first concert, which amounted to fivepence half-penny, sent the inhabitants of the most roue capital of the world mad, following up her successes with England and America, where she made net profits amounting to a million in fifteen months. I had the pleasure of introducing her to Rossini, who listened with intense attention to her sympathetic voice, warned her against the use of those exceptionally high notes which so delighted the audiences of Europe and America, and I have seen through her career many triumphs, the last of which, alas! is to be expected on June 20th, and will be a solemn leave-taking in addition."

Out of the Mouths of Babes.

There is a certain little girl in this city who was being instructed by her teacher not long since in regard to the different rulers of the world. She was told that in Europe the people are all governed by Kings and Queens. "And now," asked the teacher, "Who governs the people in this country?" The little girl looked up into the teacher's face and answered earnestly and promptly, Knaves."

ADVERTISING FOR A POSITION.

A Sadly Interesting Experience of a Woman Seeking Work.

Once I advertised myself as seeking the place of governess to children or companion to a lady. There was no possible invitation to intrigue in the form of my advertisement, although I never dreamed of avoiding such appearance, never even remembered that a great city is full of harpies snuffling for corruption and scenting it everywhere. Among the perfectly honorable and business-like answers to my advertisement, one or two came that made my hair stand on end. One invited me, in covertly insulting language, to come and care for his children while his wife was in Europe—if I was under 21! A second was so appalling that I never read it through, and shudder to this day that I ever read so much. None of my business-like answers ever came to anything save one. A gentlemanly person called upon me on Murray Hill. He was very talkative and agreeable, chatted of theatres, churches, popular preachers, Greenwood cemetery, ocean steamers, summer resorts and new novels. There was nothing to startle me in the visit, although I wondered continually why he did not approach the real object of the interview. Just as I had made up my mind that he probably was waiting for me to introduce it, he looked at his watch, suddenly started up as if in consternation, saying, "I beg ten thousand pardons, but I had quite forgotten my train. You will allow me to write you upon the subject of your advertisement?" and was gone. A few days after I received a letter from him, far away in Illinois. He wrote that he had intended to have "some fun" during his late visit to New York, and had answered "heaps" of advertisements in pursuit of that intention. "The minute I saw you, however, I saw that 'fun' was not in your line; but I found you so brilliant and charming that I could not get away, although I sat upon pins and needles every instant of my call. I am a widower, 37, with two children, an income of ——" and thus the letter ran on till it came to the proposal of a correspondence, with a view to marriage. Of course I never replied to this letter. I afterwards found out from friends in his own city that the man had given me his real name and a truthful account of his circumstances—with one important exception. Instead of being a widower, he was the divorced husband of two wives, and had narrowly missed State Prison as a bigamist.—Lippincott's Magazine.

SUMMER IN A BLOCK OF ICE.

A Live Earthworm Found Incased in the Cold Crystal.

A large block of ice was taken to the South Carolina Railway station this morning to supply the "coolers" on the outgoing trains—and thereby hangs a tale. Agent Wells and his corps of assistants, when they proceeded to crack the ice—which melts so soon these hot days that it is not what it's "cracked up to be"—made a discovery which would have set the New York papers, fresh in their attacks on the bacteria in the Hudson river, agog with excitement and indignation. It was not a homeless little bacterium, invisible to the naked eye and demanding a microscopic investigation to tell what it was. It was a live, wiggly, squirmy earthworm, four inches in length, in full possession of his powers of wriggling, and in fact seeming not a little refreshed by his residence in his crystal citadel. It was a cool retreat and showed a discriminating taste in the worm, if, indeed, he got into such a crystal palace by his own volition. It was probably thrust upon him, a "cold wave" sweeping down the Hudson and embedding him, like a pre-Adamite shell or fossil, in a glacier, and the icemen, gleaning the frozen fields, brought him to the warm South. When the block was split open there lay the worm in his icy atmosphere as snug as a bug in a rug and as full of life as a Savannah mosquito or a St. Augustine sandfly. He squirmed and he struggled like Nanki-Poo when he was released, to the amusement and wonder of a cluster of spectators. Mr. Wells still has the worm in his possession. Wouldn't it have been sad to have drunk such a thing? Ugh! An exasperated public may be excused for drawing the line at earthworms as bacteria.—Charleston (S.C.) Sun.

CURED THROUGH PORES OF HER SKIN.

The Peculiar Method by Which a Kentucky Girl Was Kept Alive for Some Months.

Miss Annie Cole, a young woman living on Clay street near Jefferson, died this morning after a protracted illness, having been nourished for several months preceding her death through the pores of her skin. The case is an unusual one, and has elicited considerable attention. Some time ago, when it was found impossible to administer nourishment to the invalid through the usual channel, every device was resorted to that her life might be saved from a death of starvation. The stomach rejected all food, and even the liquid gruels and other substances which were introduced did not remain in the stomach long enough to impart nourishment. Miss Cole was emaciated and on the point of death when the attending physician noticed that the action of the pores of the skin was normally healthy. As half of the digestible matter is emitted through the pores of the skin an effort was made to introduce nourishment in that way. A mixture of oil and grease was composed and applied externally. The heated skin rapidly absorbed the nutriment and the patient showed signs of renewed vigor. After each of these applications the skin was carefully cleaned, and in this way Miss Cole lived until to-day, when she died. The case has rarely been duplicated in the history of medical science.—Louisville special.

Diet for Brain Workers.

The most suitable diet for brain workers, says an authority, consists of rice and sweet milk with dates, raisins, or figs, with brown bread and butter. There is no substance in the vegetable kingdom more nourishing and strengthening than rice. It is a diet on which persons can do much work either of brain or body; it will keep a healthy person in health, and build up a debilitated constitution. No one should live exclusively on rice, but every one should make it one of the constituents of his diet.

A CHARMING LADY IN TROUSERS.

Mme. Dieulafoy, the Plucky Explorer, and Her Odd Dress.

The pulpit will be able to obtain some local color for sermons taken from the Book of Esther in the newly opened Persian museum at the Louvre. All the objects there were within the last four years dug up under the direction of M. and Mme. Dieulafoy (but especially of madame) at Shushan, which ancient city is in a mound condition, like Ninevah or Babylon. The wall-facings, in tiles, baked, painted and forming figures of men and animals in bas-relief, are similar to those in stone at Persepolis, the summer capital of Darius the Great. Among the animals is a lion, life-size, which Barye might have been proud to own as his work. The human figures are less good, and are placed in profile one after the other. Gen. Sir Robert Smith, who was at the opening of the museum, knew Mme. Dieulafoy in Persia, witnessed many of her innumerable difficulties, and tells me she was the soul of the enterprise in which her husband was engaged. Both suffered greatly from fever. But her spirits and courage were irrepressible, and she never let depression take hold of her. She is one of the most charming women that I ever met, and not at all brazen in her masculine habiliments, which she first donned seventeen years ago to get the more conveniently through ambulance work. In Persia she must have broken down under the drag and impediments of a feminine wardrobe, to the slavery of which she could not now submit. She was newly married in 1870. Her husband, who is about 40—a singularly nice fellow, and by profession a civil engineer—treats her as a comrade and adores her. No wonder. Though so jaunty, so spruce, so "dear," and looking so like a little masher, she is not intentionally coquettish, but is absorbed in her work, and equal to it. Her conversation is exhilarating, and that without boisterousness, and she has a splendidly ready wit of a feminine savor. The voice, the smile and the gracious manner are of a piece with the wit, which reminds one of some of Shakspeare's heroines. It was so funny to see her, hat in hand, doing the honors to Madame Carnot at the opening of the Persian museum. The hair is cut as close as the scissors could go and squared at the temples. Madame Dieulafoy has exquisite hands, but wears no rings. All the elegance of her attire is in the masher-like shirt collar and figured silk cravat. This remarkable French lady rather shuns than courts publicity. "Not at home" orders are perpetual at her house, unless when the concierge recognizes an intimate friend, and she won't let herself be interviewed.—London Truth.

BRITISH COLUMBIA EXPRESS ROBBED

Masked Men Stop the Stage—$3,500 in Gold Dust Secured.

A most daring robbery took place on Saturday evening at 6 o'clock about 26 miles above Soda Creek. The Cariboo four-horse stage, Mr. J. R. Tait, driver, was on a bridge when two masked men confronted him with a rifle and pistol, and ordered him to stop his horses. They then compelled him to leave the stage, and took the sack out of the waggon which contained $3,500 in gold dust. He was then ordered to get into his place and drive on. One of the highway men wore a dark calico mask; the other had a flour sack over his head. One man stood on each side of the stage when they ordered the driver to stop, and the largest man kept Tait covered with the rifle until he drove away. There were no passengers on the waggon, and as the driver had the reins in his hands he had no chance to use weapons. The Government agents are scouring the country with a number of special constables, and all the Alexandria Indians are hunting for the robbers. A reward of $500 has been offered for their capture. It will be a very difficult thing for them to leave that portion of the country, and news of their arrest is expected in a short time. Mr. F. S. Barnard states that he believes the same men robbed the stage four years ago, and succeeded in getting clear with $4,000. Mr. Tait's brother was driving the stage at that time, and the robbery took place about 100 miles below the scene of the robbery on Saturday last.—B. C. Daily Times, July 3rd.

A New Direction for Art.

The hot spell in Orillia (by the way, isn't Orillia a summer resort to which the residents of less favored regions flee to escape from the heat?) has set the Packet man to moralizing, with this result: You remember how sweltering hot it was the other morning. I proposed to go down to town without a collar. Mrs. P. at once objected with "what will Mrs. Grundy say?" I came off second best in the argument which ensued, and started off—a little late in consequence—keeping my neck (for all the world just as if I had a boil on it) as nearly as possible in the centre of the starched abomination. It has been duly impressed upon me that it is vulgar to perspire, and so the more I tried not to do it the hotter I became. Half a mile from home the starch began to melt, and at Slaven's corner I might as well have had a wet cloth round my thorax. Fortunately this was not the day where there was no water in the fountains, but all the agony might have been avoided if the fellow's wife hadn't been a virtual slave to Mrs. Grundy. If the Mayor of Orillia were to frame a by-law to the effect that during the dog-days coat, waist-coat and collar be deemed unnecessary to a complete toilet, his year of office would ever be remembered with gratitude. The young ladies would leave off painting plaques and bannerets, and take to the embroidering of braces and waistbelts. Art would receive an impetus; we would all look forward to the "latest novelty in shirtings" and a zest would be added to our daily life. It must be enacted however, that only the quietest patterns be worn in church, as the display of gorgeous apparel is quite sufficient as at present.

The World is His.

THE FORCE OF NATURAL GAS.

Amazing Power of an Agency that Shakes the Earth.

Although the wells about Findlay are under control, the tubing is anchored, and the awful force is held under the gates and levers of steel, it is impossible to escape a feeling of awe in this region at the subterranean energies which seem adequate to blow the whole country heavenward. Some of the wells were opened for us. Opening a well is unscrewing the service pipe and letting the full force of the gas issue from the pipe at the mouth of the well. When one of these wells is thus opened the whole town is aware of it by the roaring and the quaking of the air. The first one exhibited was in a field a mile and a half from the city. At the first freedom from the screws and clamps the gas rushed out in such density that it was visible. Although we stood several rods from it, the roar was so great that one could not make himself heard shouting in the ear of his neighbor. The geologist stuffed cotton in his ears and tied a shawl about his head, and, assisted by the chemist, stood close to the pipe to measure the flow. The chemist, who had not taken the precaution to protect himself, was quite deaf for some time after the experiment. A four-inch pipe, about 60 feet in length, was then screwed on and the gas ignited as it issued from the end on the ground. The roaring was as before. For several feet from the end of the tube there was no flame, but beyond was a sea of fire sweeping the ground and rioting high in the air—billows of red and yellow blue flame, fierce and hot enough to consume everything within reach. It was an awful display of power. We had a like, though only a momentary, display at the famous Karg well, an eight million feet well. This could only be turned on for a few seconds at a time, for it is in connection with the general system. If the gas is turned off, the fires in houses and factories would go out, and if it were turned on again without notice, the rooms would be full of gas and an explosion follow an attempt to relight it. This danger is now being removed by the invention of an automatic valve in the pipe supplying each fire, which will close and lock when the flow of gas ceases, and admit no more gas until it is opened. The ordinary pressure for house service is about two pounds to the square inch. The Karg well is on the bank of the creek, and the discharge-pipe through which the gas (though not in its full force) was turned for our astonishment extends over the water. The roar was like that of Niagara; all the town shakes when the Karg is loose. When lighted, billows of flame rolled over the water, brilliant in color and fantastic in form, with a fury and rage of conflagration enough to strike the spectator with terror. I have never seen any other display of natural force so impressive as this. When this flame issues from an upright pipe, the great mass of fire rises eighty feet into the air, leaping and twisting in fiendish fury. For six weeks after this well was first opened its constant roaring shook the nerves of the town, and by night its flaming torch lit up the heavens and banished darkness. With the aid of this new agent anything seems possible.—C. D. Warner in Harper's Magazine for July.

Choosing a Text.

The late Rev. Dr. E——, of Glasgow, was met in Argyle street one day by a very diminutive (in stature) brother of the same denomination, who hailed from the Highlands, and who was about to enter the matrimonial state. Accosting the doctor, he said: "I'm going to be married, Dr. E——, and I would like you to come down to O—— and preach me in," (meaning kirk him). "Ye're gaun to be married!" said the doctor. "Who is the happy woman?" "Oh! Miss Gracie P——," replied the embryo benedict. "All right, then; I'll preach ye in," said Dr. E——. So all arrangements were made. When the time arrived the Glasgow divine found his way to the manse of O——, where he met with a very hearty reception, the young couple having just arrived from spending their honeymoon. The following morning (Sunday), when in the vestry, the newly-made benedict thus addressed the doctor: "Now, doctor, I hope you'll make no allusion to my marriage in your sermon, I think Mrs. R. would feel it." "Never fear that, my little man," said the doctor, "ye're that wee ye're hardly worth while takin' notice o'." Thus assured they parted—the one to his pew, the other to the pulpit. All went well till the time for the sermon came, when, to the amazement of the minister and the amusement of the large congregation, the doctor gave out for his text these words: "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, was this Grace given."

An Eastern Calamity.

The Hong Kong Daily Press gives a most doleful account of the ruin and misery wrought by terrible weather, in the East River district especially. Such rains have not been known for more than 100 years. Unquestionably the rainfall has been of a most unprecedented character. The town of Shekhung, the chief sugar mart of the Province, has several times been flooded and many persons have been drowned, while from all parts of the province comes tales of ruin and disaster in some form or other.

Poor Rule That Didn't Work Both Ways

Charlie—Did you ever see such a fellow to argue as Brown? I argued with him a whole hour yesterday, but he wouldn't give in.

Herbert—You're right, 'cause I know I had to argue with him a whole week before he stopped arguing.

Charlie—What a fool a fellow is to argue so much.

Herbert—Yes—a perfect idiot.

THE SUN'S ENERGY.

Its Generating Power and the Work it is Capable of Performing.

The most satisfactory way of arriving at an idea of the enormous energy of the sun is by measuring the amount of heat which his rays are capable of generating; and, further, by our knowledge of the relation which exists between heat and mechanical work we are able at once to estimate the amount of work which the sun is capable of doing, and also the quantity of energy he must be losing year by year. By suitable arrangements we can cause a certain quantity of his radiation to be absorbed by water or other substance, and note the rise of temperature which results, and as we know the mechanical equivalent of each degree of temperature in water, for instance, it is only a matter of calculation to arrive at a knowledge of the sun's total energy. Like everything else connected with this wonderful body, figures give us no adequate conception of his energy, and various illustrations have been used by different investigators. Thus, Herschel considered it in relation to the quantity of ice which it would melt in a given time, and states that the amount of heat which the earth receives when the sun is overhead would melt an inch thickness of ice in two hours and thirteen minutes. From this it can be calculated that if the body of the sun were entirely surrounded by a sheet of ice on its surface of more than a mile in thickness, the sun's heat would entirely melt this coating of ice in the same time—namely, two hours and thirteen minutes. Prof. Young uses an even more striking illustration. He says: "If we could build up a solid column of ice from the earth to the sun, two miles and a quarter in diameter, spanning the inconceivable abyss of ninety-three million miles, and if the sun should concentrate his power upon it, it would dissolve and melt, not in an hour, not in a minute, but in a single second; one swing of the pendulum and it would be water, seven more and it would be dissipated in vapor." Of course, of this enormous quantity of heat the earth receives but a very small fraction. The remainder, except, of course, what the other planets receive, passes away into space, and is lost forever, so far as can be ascertained, to the solar system. If we estimate in mechanical power what we do receive, we find this to be on each square foot of surface equivalent, on an average, to about forty tons raised a mile high yearly, or to one-horse power continuously acting, to every thirty square feet of the earth's surface. It is by this enormous supply of energy that the whole world is kept alive and active. It keeps us warm, and drives our steam engines and water-wheels; it circulates our atmosphere, and brings us rain and snow in due season; it grows and nourishes our plants and animals, and, in a word, is the source of almost every earthly blessing.

A Joke on Hermann.

"I once had a singular experience," he said, "while giving a performance at the house of the Governor of Montevideo, in which I had the tables turned on me. During my performance I noticed three half savage Patagonians standing aside from the rest of the company, and I at once determined to have some fun with them. From the nose of the first I took an orange, from the hair of the second I took a number of silver coins, and the third was overpowered with terror when I extracted a live rat from his nose. Uttering a cry of fright, the Patagonians withdrew. While receiving the congratulations of the guests on the success of the entertainment I discovered that my watch and chain, purse, eyeglasses and handkerchief were missing. In a short time the Patagonians returned, and the one from whose nose the rat had been taken handed me the missing articles. He had picked my pocket at the moment he appeared to be overcome with fright."—New Haven Union.

Too Thin-Skinned.

Summer resort hotel man—I am very sorry, sir, but you won't do here, and I must dispense with your services.

New clerk—Eh? What's the matter?

"You are too thin-skinned."

"Sir?"

"Oh, I mean no offence, none at all: it's your misfortune, not your fault. You see, your skin is so thin that the blood shows through. You blush up easily, and when the thermometer is over 150 in the shade your face gets so red and you look so uncomfortable that it drives away custom."

What Ails the Newspaper Men?

A despatch from Minneapolis, Minn., says: Ariel C. Harris, one of the best known newspaper men in the northwest, has eloped to South America with Mrs. E. J. Frederick, a woman who has for the past two years filled a position as typewriter for the Minnesota Abstract Company. Harris leaves a wife and two children.

"One breaks the glass and cuts his fingers
But they whom Truth and Wisdom lead
Can gather honey from a weed."

Those who are wise, and who love the truth, will believe what we say when we tell them that Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has done more to relieve the sufferings of women than all other medicines now known to science. It cures all irregularities, internal inflammation and ulceration, displacements and kindred troubles. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

The Higher Education.

"What did your daughter graduate in?" asked a friend of another. "White silk, with a satin corsage and elbow sleeves," was the prompt answer. "I mean what branches," said the startled guest. "Oh, her—her—why, the usual studies, I suppose," answered the perplexed mother.

"Logic is Logic."

Now there was the case of our friend Mckay
He said to himself, in his resolute way,
That a cough which was growing from bad to worse
Must be cured, in spite of a slender purse.
An ocean voyage was out of the question,
A Florida trip a useless suggestion;
Yet die he wouldn't! His money he paid
For the "Golden Medical Discovery," by Dr Pierce made;
And as sound as a nut is his health to-day—
"Logic is logic, that's all I say."

THE HEAD IN HOT WEATHER.

A Veteran East Indian Tells How Americans Invite Sunstroke.

Before Captain Crockhart assumed command of the steamship Devonia he served many years as first officer on steamers plying through the Mediterranean and the Suez Canal to the East Indian ports. On his last trip to New York he chatted with a reporter about the hot weather and the frequent records of prostration and sunstrokes found in the newspapers here during the torrid summer.

"It is astonishing," said he, "that a people so practical and scientific as the Americans should permit this evil to go so long unchecked, for the vast majority of sunstrokes are easily preventable by affording proper protection to the head. Almost every man I meet in New York has his hair trimmed closely with one of those diminutive lawn mowers in the hottest months, and wears the flimsiest sort of a hat, whether of straw or felt. That is a weak shield against the penetrating rays of your glaring, scorching sun. Women find a natural safeguard in their abundant hair, especially when they wear it coiled on the top of the head. Of course they are not exposed as much to the sun's rays as the men are, but even if they were the ratio of prostration would be much larger among the males with their thin headgear and closely cropped hair. Sunstroke is almost unknown among the natives of eastern countries. You may think that the coiled turban of an East Indian is a heavy and ungainly thing to wear about one's brain, but instinct and experience have taught him the advisability of giving ample protection to the head, no matter how coolly he may apparel the rest of his body. Then, too, the use of umbrellas is very general in countries near the equator. Europeans in the east realize the value of light but thick helmets. You in New York will learn after awhile to wear the right kind of hat in summer. Then there will be fewer sunstrokes, except such as are produced by sheer negligence or alcoholic excess."—New York World.

What Would You Call This?

When I was a boy about 17, in 1874, I went to college during the day and after school hours I worked for my board at my stepfather's. One afternoon, returning from college, and about five blocks from home, I suddenly made an involuntary jump, such as boys are wont to do when something pleases them, and said aloud: "Grandfather is here!" He lived nearly fifty miles distant in the country, and of whose coming none of the family were aware, as he seldom visited the city. I thought it was strange to act as I did, and when I reached home I asked my mother: "Is grandfather here?"

She replied, "No," looking surprised, and said, "Why do you ask?"

"Oh, just for fun," I replied.

Going upstairs at once to change my clothes, as I came down the front stairs and entered the shop by a side door, who should come to the front door simultaneously but grandfather! Now, no one of all the relatives knew of his coming, and all were greatly surprised at the occurrence and how I should know what no one else knew in the city.—*F. W. Will You Read This For $500?

For many years the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, who are abundantly responsible financially, as any one can easily ascertain by inquiry, have offered, in good faith, a standing reward of $500 for a case of nasal catarrh, no matter how bad or of how long standing, which they cannot cure. The Remedy is sold by druggists at 50c.

Justice Deferred.

A Scotch judge having sentenced a sheep stealer to be hanged on the 28th of the then current month, the prisoner called out to him—"My Lord, my Lord, I hae'na got justice here the day!" The judge, who was arranging his papers previous to leaving the court, looked up with a twinkle of grim fun in his eye, and consolingly answered—"Weel, weel, my mon, ye'll get it on the 28th!"

Will You Try Nerviline

For all kinds of pain? Polson's Nerviline is the most efficient and prompt remedy in existence for neuralgia, lumbago and headache. For internal use it has no equal. Relief in five minutes may be obtained from Nerviline in any of the following complaints, viz.: Cramps in the stomach, chills, flatulent pains. Buy a ten cent sample bottle of Nerviline at any drug store and test the great remedy. Large bottles 25 cents.

Summer Plans.

Mrs. Featherly—Oh, my dear Mrs Sprongie, where are you going to spend the summer?

Mrs. Sprongie—I don't know, I'm sure. It all depends on Charley's business. If he can only make a fashionable failure we'll rent a cottage at Newport.—Rochester Herald.

Good for Jeff.

What queer combinations are wrought by time! Sheridan received his first commission from Jefferson Davis, when the latter was Secretary of War. To-day Davis is one of the sincerest sympathizers the sick man has.—Mail and News.

THURSDAY, JULY 26, 1888.

Change in Business !

The undersigned has disposed of his Newspaper and Job Printing plant in Flesherton to Mr. W. H. Thurston, late of the Toronto World. Mr. Thurston is a thoroughly practical man, an able journalist, and is well known in the district. A full announcement in connection therewith will be made in next week's ADVANCE.

The public's obedient servant,

A. R. FAWCETT.

Priceville Items.

From our own Correspondent.

We wish that the ADVANCE devil would adopt some means so that he could avoid making blundering mistakes as were made in the prices of cattle that was quoted last week. Some mistake must have been taken out when I put during last week by Hugh McArthur, Wm. Watson and others. Mr. Watt takes the lead, for he has a speckled beauty on Kincardine street bridge the other day that weighed over 2 lbs. Aye mon, 'twas a gude yen!

Mr. Hugh McArthur tells how he was out looking after his cattle a few days ago and fell in with two young bears which he followed across the fields and into a piece of woods owned by Mr. T. Ferguson, in the suburbs of the village. On reaching the bush they turned to show Mr. McArthur their teeth and he retreated.

The base ball club are jubilant over their victory at Markdale. The return game will be played this week.

It is just delightful to walk into the Telegraph and Post Offices since they have been placed under Miss Brown's management. Everything neat, clean and in order. The windows are decorated with the finest collection of house plants in the village.

One of our citizens remarked the other day that "Muddy Valley must be completely dry, never a croak or chirp this two weeks." Perhaps the late showers will enliven the said Valley a trifle.

Muddy Valley.

From our own Correspondent.

The farmers around here are earnestly praying for rain. We hope they will be answered as the crops are getting badly withered with the sun. There are fields of oats heading out and the straw not over six inches long.

Mr. John Alcorn happened with a slight accident the other day in which he had both eyes badly blackened. He has a breechy horse and in order to explain in the field he has him blindfolded. One day not long ago he had him in the stable and was in the act of putting on the blind he threw it over his eyes suddenly when the horse became frightened and struck him in the face with his foot marking him badly. We have seen worse who were at the Irish Lake row that came off safer.

Mr. Archibald Shaw, from Dakota, is the guest of Mr. D. Ferguson.

Mr. Jeremiah Burke, of Proton, and Miss Coin, of Seaforth, were united in wedlock a few days ago. The happy couple have our hearty congratulations.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth? If so send at once and get a bottle of "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers, there is no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums, reduces Inflammation, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughout the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP," and take no other kind.

Letter from W. Suggitt, Esq.

It was a delightful thing to see people of different conditions making their way to the place of prayer and joining in the old familiar hymns and rendering their ascriptions of praise to the Great Ruler of earth and sea.

Day after day passes—all in their ocean home straining every effort to make each happy—some telling the stories of bygone days, past to return no more, some reading, and others availing themselves with the amusements furnished in the ship.

But, silence reigns! The moment has arrived to catch the first glimps of the dear old land, and in a few hours the Great Unseen Captain—who has ever been with us all the way across the troubled sea of life—leads his earthly ship in safety to the harbor where she would be.

On Saturday, 9th of June at 3:30 p.m. passed the Parisian, of the Allan Line, and wondered if dear Mr. and Mrs. Beecroft were on board. I understood they expected to sail about that time.

Monday, the 11th, at noon, Liverpool is reached and the parties, which had never met before, dispersed, never, perhaps, to meet again on earth. Warm friendships had been formed.

After having passed through the Customs, took train for town of Hull. Next day visited the far-famed city of Lincoln, where I called upon friends. Viewed the celebrated cathedral and far-famed bell. Visited Mr. Legard's former home and other places, then returned to Hull.

LETTER NO. 2.

Mr. Suggitt's second letter was written at Kilham, East Riding of Yorkshire, June 28th, and we give that which is of interest to the general reader. Mr. Suggitt says:

In my last I had visited various places in Lincolnshire. I may say I saw King William's statue at Hull. Your friend, Mr. Wm. Guy, of Maxwell, told me to watch and when King Wm. heard the High Church clock strike he would come down from his house and go to dinner! Kindly let friend Guy know he can't have heard it, for he is there in the market yet (and likely to be!) so is the Church, and the clock.

I saw the monument of that great and and good man, Wm. Wilberforce, also the house and room in which he fiast saw light. At Beverley I saw the grand old minster, which is said to have been used by Oliver Cromwell as a stable during his wonderful exploits in England.

Visited the shop where I worked fifty years ago. It is carried on still by younger members of the same family. Went and had a view of the old house, where I boarded with a brother's family. When I left for Canada, they had one little baby girl. Now I have met with five noble looking nieces all married and comfortably settled in the town of Hull. My sister also alive and looking exceedingly well, although 75 years of age. I have seemed to live those early days of my life over again!

Apart from my own dear family connections, I have been most agreeably surprised to meet with so many of my earlier associations. Arriving at my own native town, Great Duffield, the first enquiry was for Mr. Merkin and his good lady, school children with me. You will understand how glad and what a happy meeting, when I inform you that same R. Merkin and myself two boys 20 years of age, were placed on the Methodist plan together as Exhorters and Prayer Leaders—this is 50 years ago. I found him still living and working for Christ. In the summer of 1809, the church of St. Peter's, in the Parish of Little Duffield, one mile from my native town, it was, from an entry in the Parish Account Book, rebuilt; but this statement clearly does not apply to the chancel arch, tower, and South wall of the chancel—these all tell of a church of great antiquity, whilst the fact that Alfred, King of Northumbria, was buried there A. D. 705, leaves no doubt that this has been the scene of Christian worship for 12 centuries.

I also visited the place where I had spent seven long years as an apprentice and where I had formed many Christian associations. Surprised to find so many still living. Mrs. James Beecroft's native place. She had been there about two weeks, had left when I arrived, but learned since that they had not yet sailed home—having heard from them by friends, who had seen Mr. and Mrs. Beecroft in Hull. Cannot say when I shall return home. I am enjoying myself very much. Had the pleasure of reading the Flesherton news in THE ADVANCE. Regret to learn of Mrs. Duncan's death, but it is all right.

With kind Christian greeting, ever yours till we meet in Glory,

WILLIAM SUGGITT.

A ten acre field of standing hay belonging to Mr. Miles near Maxwell caught fire last Saturday and the whole field soon levelled to the ground. The fences were also burned in places.—[Dundalk Herald.

THE dwelling of Mrs. McKnight's farm, con. 2, S. D. R., occupied by Mr. Chris. Wendorf, was destroyed by fire on Saturday morning. The contents were nearly all consumed. An insurance of $150 was on the building.—[Hanover Post.

Bert Telford, a little fellow about nine years old, son of Mr. Robert Telford got the ends of his third forth fingers on the left hand badly crushed, while playing with the cog wheel machinery of a grindstone, last Wednesday afternoon.—[Chatsworth News.

We are sorry to learn that our friend Assessor, Mr. James Campbell of Pretty River Valley met with a bad accident lately by falling on a snag and cutting the calf of his leg in a horrid manner. Mr. Campbell will likely be laid up for two or three weeks.—Thornbury Standard.

The Rev. Mr. Ross, our Presbyterian minister here has been invited by the session and managing board of Maxwell and McIntyre Presbyterian Congregations to accept a call there at a salary of not less than $800 with manse. We have not yet heard his decision on the matter.—[Dundalk Herald.

Not a particle of calomel, nor any other deleterious substance, enters into the composition of Ayer's Pills. On the contrary, this medicine is carefully compounded from the curative properties of purely vegetable substances. Try it.

The chambermaid at the Middaugh House found a pocketbook under a pillow while making one of the beds last Tuesday forenoon. She at once handed it over to Mr. Middaugh, who on referring to the register, found that Mr. V. Adams, of Drayton, had occupied the room. To say that Mr Adams was pleased on the recovery of his pocketbook, which contained between two and three thousand dollars, would be a mild-way to express his feelings.—[Durham Chronicle.

If you wish to restore the blood to your wasted cheek, and so improve your health that plumpness and strength will succeed emaciation and debility, purify your blood with Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This remedy will benefit you more surely and speedily than any other.

BATTLING WITH A HIGHWAYMAN.

A Young Lady's Fearful Struggle and Narrow Escape.

A Pittsfield, Mass., despatch says: Miss Gertrude Clapp, a young and wealthy society lady who lives in this city, was brutally assaulted and robbed by some unknown man on Gold avenue last night at about half-past 9 o'clock. She was walking alone from Mrs. Allen's, on Pomeroy avenue, to Mrs. Hubbard's, on Gold avenue, a distance of perhaps a quarter of a mile. When she reached a dark place where the electric light is almost shut out by the thick foliage of shade trees a man leaped over the hedge directly in front of her and in a hoarse voice demanded her money. Miss Clapp is a very muscular young lady and not easily frightened. She refused to give him her pocketbook, but he stepped up to her and took her roughly by the arms and told her he must have her money. She gave him a blow over the head with her umbrella, which he snatched away from her and grasped her by the hair. She then struck him a vigorous blow in the face with a large glass smelling bottle. This made the scoundrel very angry, and with a terrible oath he told her to give up her money or he would murder her on the spot. He had pulled much of her hair out by this time and struck a blow in her face. She called for help and the man caught her by the throat and threw her to the ground, holding on to her throat tightly and demanding her money. In her desperation she handed him her pocket-book, which contained about $20 in bills and some gold pieces, in all about $30. The desperado now relinquished his hold of her throat, and having possession of her pocketbook started away a few steps.

Miss Clapp now shouted "Etop thief!" and he returned to her and choked her till she came near fainting. Her situation was now very desperate, and she struggled hard with the villain, who had succeeded in throwing her upon the ground. The struggle lasted for some time. The man continued to curse, and as no one approached he grew bolder. Miss Clapp found that she would soon become exhausted, and she summoned all her strength, and as he relaxed his hand from her throat she shouted as loud as she could and the villain ran away. Miss Clapp feared he would again attack her, and she ran as fast as her weak condition would allow her, and reached Lawyer E. M. Wood's residence, about twenty rods away on Gold avenue, in a very exhausted state. There were wicked marks on her throat, but no other serious injury had been done her.

The assault took place when the wind was blowing very hard and just as a heavy thunder shower was coming on from the northwest. The vivid flashes of lightning revealed the man's features and dress. Miss Clapp thinks he was between 25 and 30 years of age, of medium height and of a powerful frame. His eyes looked like those of a madman as she caught glimpses of them by the lightning flashes. He wore dark clothes and a derby hat. Every effort has been made to-day by the police to find some trace of him, but all efforts have thus far failed.

STEWED CHINAMEN.

How the Bodies of Deceased Celestials are Prepared for Shipment.

A New York telegram says: The remains of sixteen dead Chinamen packed in tin barrels were shipped by the National Express to-day for Cathay, China, where they will be deposited in the flowery burying grounds of that place. A firm of celestial philanthropists assembled together some time ago and made a tour of the States to collect the bones of their deceased compatriots and ship them back to China. They started from San Francisco, some months ago, in search of the heathen dead. They went to Los Angeles, to Denver, Kansas City, Wheeling, W. Va., Pittsburg, Beaver Falls, Philadelphia and New York, and collected in all 215 bodies. In each city they first located the graves of their friends and carefully exhumed them. Buried as the bodies were in ordinary Caucasian coffins, the difficulty of transporting them seemed large and the expense appalling. Some proposed to ship all the boiled flesh in one barrel and the bones in a packing case, but the idea was scouted on account of the difficulty that would attend the division of the material among mourning relatives at home. So it was agreed to stow every man separately and to boil him down to the smallest possible space imaginable so as to set in a jelly when cold. Square tins suitable for holding one boiled body each were obtained and the remains were cooked so as to fit exactly. It was found that a Chinaman's corpse could be boiled down so as to average about 33 pounds, and that is what was done with all of them, big and little alike.

A PLUCKY PREACHER.

He Tackles a Burglar and Gets the Best of Him.

A Minneapolis telegram says: Early Thursday morning a Minneapolis preacher had the physical courage to tackle and the strength to conquer a would-be burglar. Wednesday night the Rev. W. T. Chase, of 1,413 Harmon place, retired at peace and harmony with all the world. About 4:30 Thursday morning he was aroused by a premonition of danger. He opened his eyes and was startled by seeing a strange man leaning over him. His first thought was that of a burglar after something, and he determined to prevent him. Springing up he grasped the fellow with both hands, and then began a rough-and-tumble fight. It was first preacher, then burglar on top. At last Dr. Chase got the fellow to the top of the stairs, and then, using all his strength, he hurled him head first down the steps. The fellow landed in a heap at the bottom, but gathered himself up before Mr. Chase could reach him and ran to a side window, rolled out, and started on a run for the park. Mrs. Chase heard the noise and rushed out from her room just in time to see the wrestling match. "Let him go, father! Let him go!" said she; but her husband hung on and proved that he could handle a terrestrial devil as well as a spiritual one.

Times are tough on the poor of Russia. They have but little to sell. They are heavily taxed, and the London News says they are actually starving to death in great numbers.

ROMANCE OF A LIFE.

Crossed in Love a Young Girl Marries in Pique and Dies in a Poorhouse.

A Middletown, N. Y., despatch says: The death of an inmate of the Chenango county almshouse brings to a close a very strange and interesting life story. The name of the deceased was Amanda Townsend, and she was born and reared in New York city, where her nearest of kin, the Townsends and Colgates, are people of wealth and high standing. While she was yet in her teens her hand was sought in marriage by a young man whom she favored but who failed to be acceptable to her parents. She was sent to Richfield Springs to spend the summer, and probably also to separate her from her lover, and while there was informed that he on whom she had fixed her affections had proved faithless and renounced her. She laid the blame of her disappointment in love on her parents and friends, and in a fit of anger and spite she eloped with and married an ignorant and uncouth young fellow named Harvey Doyo, who had been doing menial jobs around her boarding-house at the Springs, and with whom she had struck up a chance acquaintance. The elopement made a stirring sensation at the time. The ill-matched pair went to the vicinity of the husband's native place in Chenango county, and in a lonely spot on the side of the mountain between Oxford and Coventry they built a small rude cabin which they occupied for nearly a score of years thereafter as a home. At first the young wife's relatives used every possible inducement and entreaty to persuade her to forsake her spouse and coarse and uncongenial surroundings and return to a home of refinement and ease, but all efforts in this direction were unavailing and were ultimately abandoned. Whatever may have inspired her course, whether conjugal affection or pride or resentment at supposed wrongs, the educated and refined woman accepted isolation and poverty and stuck by the side of the uncouth rustic she had chosen for a husband to the last. The final separation came in the county almshouse, to which the pair had been removed in a sick and helpless condition from their cabin on the mountain side. Her kindred in the city, shocked to hear that she had been a charge upon public charity, visited her and renewed their offers of a home with them, but she still declined to be parted from her husband. She died one day last week in the alms-house, and an undertaker commissioned by her relatives gave her remains respectable and fitting burial in the rural cemetery at West Coventry.

CHICAGO'S HAUNTED HOUSE

Weird Tales of Ghosts Have Frightened Tenants for Many Years.

A Chicago despatch says: A curious example of how the popular superstition that a house is haunted ruins the name of the property is shown by the destruction of the handsome two-story brick house at No. 126 Langley avenue. This residence is in perfect repair, and were it not for the fact that it is known as a haunted house the workmen would have no reason for disturbing it. But the weird tales of what the spooks do there in the midnight hours have frightened all tenants away, and the house has been an unprofitable property ever since the ghosts moved in.

It is in a fashionable quarter of the city, and ten years ago its occupants were three maiden sisters named Trowbridge Elizabeth, aged 43, Anne, aged 40, and Nora, a half-witted woman of 25. They lived modestly, dressed well and had some property. On the evening of July 21st, 1879, a policeman was summoned to the house. He turned the slide in his lantern and led the way to the second floor, where, hanging in the archway of the folding-doors, they saw the bodies of the oldest sisters, each suspended from a hook that had been screwed into the woodwork. Within a week a sign "For Rent" was put up on the house, but renters passed by on the opposite side of the street and pointed out where the tragedy took place. Soon strange stories began to circulate about the neighborhood. Servant girls going to early mass asserted that they saw the ghosts of the "old maids" moving through the deserted rooms, while some insisted that they heard shrieks and moans. People of intelligence laughed at the idea of spooks, yet, in spite of the fact that the house had been put in thorough repair, it remained without a tenant for several years. Finally a family from the East who had heard none of these stories moved in. Within a week they were occupying another house, and the sign "For Rent" was again put up. Their domestic said that every morning the furniture would be arranged differently from the way it was the night before, while after midnight the sound of feet was plainly heard pattering around in the hallway and on the stairs. Since then several tenants have lived there, but only for a short time. They all laughed in a half-hearted way at the idea of the house being haunted, but nevertheless they could not be induced to stay.

The double suicide of years ago and the stories of the revels of the spooks have cost the owner many thousand dollars. He is now tearing the house down and will have it rebuilt from the very foundation.

Revolting Treatment of a Boy by a Woman.

A New York despatch says: Mrs. Emma Carleton, a determined-looking woman of 40 years, was convicted before Recorder Smith in General Sessions yesterday of whipping Albert Bowker, aged 14 years, with a shawl strap on June 17th. She tied his legs together and whipped him with the strap until the boy was covered with red welts an inch broad. In some places the skin was broken. The boy declared that the defendant beat him for fifteen minutes without ceasing. The jury found her guilty of assault in the third degree, the punishment for which is not more than $500 fine and a year's imprisonment.

The old man Zenug, sent up by Judge Rose at Brantford in 1884 for counterfeiting, has been released.

There is no doubt of Jay Gould being a sick man. He is suffering from nervous prostration. So bad is his condition that no person is admitted to see him on business. His family are naturally a good deal worried about his condition, but hope that a strict abstention from all business will in time effect a cure.—New York Times.

AMONG THE MORMONS.

An Englishwoman's Sad Experience—Her Husband Betrayed and Murdered—Her Son Lost and Herself a Castaway.

A Chicago despatch says: A woman giving her name as Elizabeth Turnbull Rutler, formerly from England, was picked up in the streets apparently fainting from hunger. She claimed to have had nothing to eat on a four days' trip from Ogden, on her way to England. She told the story of her terrible experience among the Mormons. Her son, she stated, had been induced against the wish of his parents to join a party of emigrants organized by Mormon missionaries in England. Not hearing from him, it was learned he had been prevented by the elders from writing. The father, frantic with anxiety, followed to Utah. He found employment with a Mormon farmer named Joseph Holbert, but was unable to save enough to continue the search until pretending to join the Church, when Rutler got money and sent some to his wife, but all his letters, telling of the condition of affairs in Utah, were intercepted and others substituted, urging her to come to Utah with the missionaries. She obeyed, and she states the women in the party were subjected to fearful indignities en route by the elders. Rutler was murdered shortly after she joined him. He had inadvertently given a young woman an inkling of his plans to find his boy and escape. The Mormons asserted that Rutler's death was accidental. The woman was defrauded out of her husband's savings, but fleeing to Ogden she earned enough money by working in a hotel to pay her passage home. The amount of railway fare was larger than she expected, but sooner than delay longer, she deprived herself of food on the way to Chicago.

A young man from Edinburgh had been addressing a prayer-meeting somewhere in the North, and after the address was over he said he would give out a hymn. "Na," said an old elder, "we maun hae a psalm." "No," replied the young man, "I'll give out a hymn; I can't get a psalm to meet my case." "What's he speakin' aboot?" said an old wife who was sitting near. "Oh!" answered the elder, "this lad says he canna get a psalm to meet his case." "Weel, weel," said she, "I doot the lad hasna a case at a' if he canna find it in the psalms."

Two splendid albums have been presented to the Prince and Princess of Wales as souvenirs of their recent visit to Glasgow. One is bound in green leather, and contains a series of photographs, on satin, of the Exhibition and of the principal buildings of the city; the other is bound in blue plush, and in it are thirty water-color sketches by members of the Glasgow Art Club. On the covers are electro-plate reproductions of old Indian plates in the British Museum, and the hinges and clasps are also of chaste electro-plate, with the Royal arms.

A cat, the property of Mrs. Simpson, Abbey street, Melrose, wandered into a neighboring house some time ago, and, the tenant leaving for a fortnight, the animal was inadvertently imprisoned in one of the rooms. Her sister—a girl about 5 years of age—seeing the child's danger, went to her assistance, boldly wading into the pool till the water reached her neck, and succeeded in getting hold of her clothes, as she was floating about, and brought her to land in a state of great exhaustion, just in time to save her from drowning.

HEREDITARY CRIME.

The Remarkable Record of Thirty Families.

MISAPPLIED BENEVOLENCE CONDEMNED.

A Buffalo despatch says: The report of the Committee on Organization for the next Conference of Charities and Corrections was adopted to-day. Bishop Gillespie, of Grand Rapids, Mich., was elected as President; Dr. O'Reilly, of Toronto, and four other Vice-Presidents were named. The next conference will be held in San Diego, California. One of the most interesting topics of the conference was discussed to-day by Rev. Oscar C. McCulloch, of Indianapolis. He presented as his contribution, "The Children of Ishmael, a Study in Social Degradation." Mr. McCulloch had upon the stage with him an immense diagram showing the social condition of thirty families through five generations, embracing 1,692 persons. The paper read upon the subject was one of the most interesting of the whole conference. The history of all these had been people followed up, covering a period of fifty years back. That history was one of the most startling nature, and covered 7,000 pages in the records of the charity organization at Indianapolis. There had been 121 prostitutes in the lot, and the illegitimate children were very numerous. The name Ishmael was chosen, as that family was the most central. One man had a family of eleven illegitimate children. There had been several murderers in the group, and thieves without number. They did not work, but they lived by begging and petty thieving. They are generally diseased. The children die young. Licentiousness characterizes all the men and women, and from this results mental weakness and general incapacity to work, and this is all met by the benevolent public with unlimited public and private aid, encouraging them in an idle and wandering life, and in the propagation of similarly disposed children. These and other grim facts were presented and deductions drawn from them. General unchastity characterizes them, and their instincts are as low as brutes go. The speaker believed that public relief was in a large degree chargeable with the perpetuation of this stock, and what public relief fails to accomplish private benevolence supplements. The so-called charitable people who give to begging women and children have a large sin to answer for. "It is from them," said Mr. McCulloch, "that this pauper element gets its consent to exist. Charity, so-called, covers a multitude of sins, and sends the pauper out with the benediction, be bountiful and multiply. Such charity has made this element; has brought children to the birth, and ensured them a life of misery, cold, hunger and sickness. So-called charity joins public relief in producing still-born children, raising prostitutes, and educating criminals." Out of all these 1,692 persons, Mr. McCulloch said he knew of but one who had risen from them and had become an honorable man. The force of inherited parentism or pauperism drives them on with irresistible force. "What can we do?" said the speaker in conclusion. "First, we must close up official outdoor relief; second, we must check private indiscriminate benevolence or charity, falsely so-called; third we must get hold of the children."

MERCY FOR A MURDERESS.

Pearl Eytinge's Eloquent Appeal on Behalf of Chiara Cignarale.

An Albany, N. Y., despatch says: Pearl Eytinge pleaded with Governor Hill yesterday afternoon for the life of the murderess Chiara Cignarale. She presented an introductory letter from Senator Cantor, and made her plea in a most dramatic manner. In a trembling voice she thus addressed the Executive: "Mercy for poor Chiara Cignarale! Oh, sir, we pray thee give one kindly thought to that poor dying creature, driven to despair by the cruelty of one who had broken his altar vows, forgotten his faith in God, dishonored the name of man by striking to earth the pale, weak, hopeless mother of his children. We implore Your Excellency to consider that dread disease has already fastened upon her poor, frail form. We have seen her upon her prison couch with great, sad, yearning eyes, from out whose dark depths sorrow and repentance are shadowed forth; we have watched her wan lips moaning in ceaseless supplication; and we beg you to grant her the blessing of Executive clemency. Exercise that grand official power and with one stroke of thy mighty pen spare poor Chiara's life, and send her that blessed reprieve wherein to save her soul and make her peace with God."

Governor Hill heard the plea patiently, though his thoughts were plainly on the big bunch of letters which had accumulated in his absence. He said he was familiar with the case, and that the newspapers had prevented a life sentence by charging the prisoner's counsel, Mr. Howe, with abandoning his client. He consulted a few moments with the Pardon Clerk, and then courteously assured Miss Eytinge that he would consider the case very carefully.

It is believed that the commutation of sentence, for which the Governor's fair visitor pleaded so earnestly, may possibly be granted.

Improvement on an Old Sell.

A good story is related at the expense of a hotel proprietor at Tacoma, W. T. A stranger, who had been stopping at the house for a few weeks, asked the proprietor how far it was to Mount Ranier, which appeared to be only a couple of miles distant, although in fact it was nearly 100. The proprietor winked at the bystanders, and said that perhaps it was a mile away. The boarder said that he believed he would walk out to it for exercise. The landlord encouraged the "tenderfoot," who, after borrowing the proprietor's fine field-glass, immediately started. The joke was too rich for the hotel man to keep, and he treated all hands. But the pedestrian did not return. The landlord at last became suspicious, and found that the valise which the "tenderfoot" had left was filled with brick-bats, and that he had carried off 17 towels, and everything else that he could get into his pockets. Besides this he owed two weeks' board bill. He is probably still walking.—Cleveland Leader.

A PROFITABLE BARGAIN.

For a Glass of Beer a Drummer Gets Two Hundred Thousand Dollars.

This may seem a large sum for a small article, but it was virtually paid by a man of great resources who had an ingenious expedient for saving the horseflesh of the world. About ten years ago a veterinary surgeon who was with the army in Bombay found that the excessive heat of that country caused the tops of the horses' necks to sweat freely and thereby produce sores under the leather collars. All the expedients that he could suggest were of no avail to remedy this state of things. One-fourth of the horses used for draught purposes were laid up by what is called "sore neck."

This "vet" in his younger days had studied chemistry, and he found that sulphate of zinc was the best and almost the only cure for horses' "sore neck," but the difficulty in applying this preparation lay in the fact that the horse had to rest during the times of the application, otherwise the collar would rub it off and there was no chance of the horse's recovery. A thought struck him that to make a zinc pad and put it under the collar would at any rate prove an ameliorative, and may be a cure. The man, though ingenious in his way, was much given to drink, and was looked upon by the officers of the army as a "ne'er do weel" with bright ideas. While this idea was simmering in his mind and before he had put it into an actual test he happened to be in a drinking bar. His finances were at this time at the lowest ebb, for his future pay was mortgaged for all it was worth and the publican refused to trust him with any more drinks. An American drummer happened to be representing a large leather house and knew a good deal of the difficulty with which the American farmers of the southwest had to contend. The two men got into conversation, and as a natural result the veterinary spoke of the idea that was uppermost in his mind and said that he thought he knew of a remedy of that most troublesome of complaints of which all horses in hot countries suffered. The American was perfectly convinced that he was talking to a man of good ideas, though bad principles, and asked what he would take for the idea.

"I am awfully hard up and can get no more drink on trust, so I will give you the idea for a glass of beer."

"Done!" said the other.

The American at once saw that there was probably millions in this and he conceived the notion that the matter oozing from the sores on horses' necks would corrode the pad and produce sulphate of zinc—thus the disease would provide its own remedy. He also saw that zinc, being a non-conductor of heat, would keep the parts cool. The more he thought of it the more he liked it, and although his business should have kept him in Bombay some months longer, he in a few days took the first steamship for Liverpool and then for Boston. Arriving at Boston he threw up his appointment with the house and started the manufacture of zinc pads, after obtaining a patent for the idea, and is now worth $200,000. These zinc pads are used in every country on earth and are the greatest blessings the farmer enjoys.

VIRTUE IS ITS OWN REWARD.

How Russell Sage Paid a Boy who Returned Lost Money.

Several days ago Russell Sage visited the Broadway (N.Y.) clothing establishment of Messrs. A. H. King & Co. for the purpose of rehabilitating his outer self in fashionable and seasonable apparel. After much discussion with the salesman as to the particular shade and fabric and an unsuccessful effort to effect a reduction in the price of a suit, Mr. Sage effected a deal by which his summer wardrobe was replenished by several suits of clothes at about the price that Berry Wall would expend for a fancy waistcoat. Shortly after the millionaire's departure from the realm of "bargains" in clothing a diminutive cash boy picked up from the floor of the store a small roll of bank notes containing $26, which, with commendable honesty, he carried to the cashier's desk, where it was placed in an envelope to await the probable call of the loser. Yesterday morning bright and early, Mr. Sage, attired in his newly-purchased garments, presented a worried countenance at the cashier's window in Messrs. King & Co.'s store. He had lost $26. His identification of the bills found on the floor was correct in every particular, and the money was immediately handed over to him, to his evident satisfaction. Mr. King beckoned to the little fellow whose integrity had rescued the railroad man from pecuniary loss, and said: "Mr. Sage, here is the boy who found your money."

"He has done his duty," said the man of millions, "and will find his reward in the future," and rolling up his wealth and carefully depositing it in his waistcoat pocket he took a dignified departure.

A Pretty Tough Place.

The editor of the Louisa East Kentucky Magnet must have run against something unpleasant when last in Cincinnati. He writes: "If we were called upon to point out a place filled with woe, sorrow, torments, tortures, doleful shades, wantonness, crimes of the blackest, horrors, murders, assassins, harlots, all concentrated in one vast, furious hell, we would unhesitatingly say Cincinnati. We are reminded of the sewers and slum holes of Paris, but we pass that by and give the answer, Cincinnati. The Eternal City under Nero, where men were tarred, placed upon poles, a torch being then applied, were used to illuminate the city, in the face of this we give the answer, Cincinnati. Jerusalem, with her hill of skulls, where Christ was crucified, with all these in our mind's eye we answer in favor of Cincinnati.

A Small Boy's Long Journey.

Little Willie Leonard, a 6-year-old boy, started off from Pittsburg last week on a 4,000 mile journey all alone. His ticket was bought for him through to Anthracite, a small mining village on the Canadian Pacific Railroad in British Columbia. The boy's father left Allegheny about one year ago and went to the west, and since that time Willie has been living with an aunt in Allegheny. Last week his father sent for him, and Thursday the child was placed in charge of the Ft. Wayne conductor, with orders to be passed along until he reached his destination.—Detroit News.

LOST ?

Lost labor? Nay, not so. The planted seed,
Unheeded and forgotten, yet shall grow
In fruitful silence, and to traveller's need
Shall grateful shade and sustenance bestow.
No act of good or ill, no task of hand
Or brain, no faithful striving of the soul,
But leaves a foot-print on life's level sand
Or, graves a letter on th' eternal scroll.
No toil is wasted: though we may not see
The harvest of the strife, the work, the rhyme.
The Master saith "What is that to thee?
Use thou the means—leave thou the end to time."

Lost faith? Ah, never What though dark the cloud?
We know beyond it lies the polar star.
Pallid the lips and hands and close the shroud—
But doubt we regions where no shadows are?
What if no answer to our cry comes back?
Our trust shall be its own supreme reward.
Knoweth the meteor of its shining track?
Or sentinels the treasures that they guard?
Not to ourselves alone shall be our faith.
But, as a lamp upon a darkened road
Guides least the bearer, light life's rugged path,
And show some faltering foot the way to God.

Lost love? Least yet of all can love be lost,
Love, the eternal—love, the portress sweet
Of Heaven's strait door—our rampart 'gainst a host
Of 'leag'ring foes—the messenger whose feet
Upon the dark heights of our sorrows haste
With lovely promise. What if thorns of pain
Crown our life's holiest effort? What if waste
Wait our soul's wealth, and sacrifice be vain?
Lost? Never dare we deem that love is lost!
Through loss and woes uncounted unatoned
Love lives and gives—and knows his heavy cost
Most blest unthanked, best guerdoned when unowned.

Latest Parisian Novelties.

A cablegram from Paris says: Embroidery will enjoy exceptional prestige next winter. Already clothes are being made less heavy. Add to the dress or garment the rich furs that fashion will impose and you will have some idea of their cost. Fortunately for modest purses common sense allows the gentlewoman to wear a plain gown, without frill or ornament. If it only fits well and the minor appointments correspond in dainty thought and freshness one can yet afford to be smiling and gracefully indulgent to the more bedizened favorites of fortune. Moreover, nothing prevents one from embroidering a vest in finely-striped Louis XV. silk or peau-de-soie, and this, with plain cloth or velvet redingote and a plain jupe of peau-de-soie, with three pinked plaitings at the edge, will be charming, and, as the French put it, a select toilet. One vest can be made to do much service. In buying the buttons for these redingotes—there are only six in front and three on each side—choose something artistic and of value and get them from a jeweller of repute, for they make or spoil garments. First the fit, then the buttons, and last of all consider the goods.

Woman in Zuni Land.

In Zuni Land the woman makes the first advances looking toward marriage. The woman raises the family. She transmits the name. She sends to the youth she chooses a basket of meal or peaches, and if he is inclined toward her he forthwith makes a present of "primary consideration," consisting of a whole deerskin, beautifully dressed and snow white. That signifies that she is provided with shoes for life. The skin is placed over the foot and then rolled around the leg and strapped down with delicate thongs. You can always tell a newly-married Zuni woman by the large roll of deerskin and by the small silver buttons that adorn the leggings. Whenever the foot piece wears out it is cut off and the roll is replaced. When the woman becomes old the roll is small. The only sanctification of the marriage is the formal adoption of the young man after the acceptance of the bundle. He is then the step-son of the girl's father.

Independence for Our Girls.

If it is not beneath the sons and daughters of a monarch to learn a trade, it ought not to be beneath the sons and daughters of Republican America to emulate their good example, provided they possess the requisite ability to do so. It is absolutely certain that happy marriages will be promoted by this very independence among women. Not being at leisure to nurse every passing fancy, girls would elect to wait patiently until the light of true love came into their lives.—Century.

Wearing Real Flowers.

A rather pretty mode is the wearing of real flowers in "trails" of bouquets on parasols at garden parties. It dates from the flower festa. There were a few at Lady Lytton's garden party early in the month, and very many at Mme Carnot's last, which wound up the season. The Presidentess was still dressed in black and white, in which colors she appeared at the dinner at the Russian Embassy, the dinner at the British Embassy and the garden party there. It is a pity for young butterflies that garden parties cannot become fashionable, there being now so few gardens (save in the Faubourg St. Germain) in Paris large enough for festal purposes. The Lockroys have a fairly large one, which I expect next year Mlle. Jeanne Hugo will make, in her natural character of Rose Queen, a centre of festivity. This season she has been debarred from social gayety by the attack she had of inflammation of the lungs. As in England, fashion over here now holds its most brilliant revels after Easter, and they go on to July, when the heat chases the butterflies to the seaside. Those beauties who are no longer young, and who mean to be beautiful forever, prefer the old way of only seeing company indoors. The crude sunlight of the garden party pitilessly shows what faces are made up. I suppose that this is why the broad-leafed hat is so much worn, and why parasols are made so impervious to the sun's rays by means of lining, lace covering, and natural flowers.—Paris Letter to London Truth.

Polygamy in Utah.

"The prettiest bather in the lake," said a returned Utah tourist to a Denver Tribune reporter, "was a sweet blonde, daughter of historic Hiram Clawson, who came to Utah with Brigham Young and built the first house in Salt Lake and Utah Territory. Mr. Clawson married two of Brigham Young's daughters, and has 32 living children." "Is polygamy dying out in Utah?" asked the reporter. "Very fast. The rich and intelligent young Mormon girls won't go into it. I saw at the theatre Miss Clawson, accompanied by a handsome young Mormon beau, to whom she is engaged. When I asked her if she allowed her beau to have another sweetheart she looked solemnly down at her solitaire ring and said, half bitterly: 'No, unless he is smooth enough to fool me.' Harper's Bazar is killing polygamy among the rich and respectable. No husband can afford to buy four or five bonnets and sealskin sacques."

The Right Kind of a Wife.

What a clever man wants is a clear-headed, sensible wife, who will forget his vagaries in remembering his brilliancy, and remain a constant shield between his sensitiveness and disagreeable things; something, in fact, like one of those cushions that sailors put down the side of the vessel to keep it from jarring too roughly against the dock. Look at me, for instance. I never wrote a word for publication, painted a picture, composed music, or did anything clever in all my life. But I make my husband just the sort of wife he needs.—Irish Times.

A Wife Lost and Found.

A Chicago correspondent of the New York World writes as follows: When Frederick Wilks, a tall, good-looking young man went home last night he found a note from his pretty little wife, Annie, that told him she had run away. The young man spent last night and to-day looking for Annie, with the aid of the police force, but she has probably gone far enough to be able to elude him. They had only been married a few months. They are from Nottingham, England, where Annie was the prettiest slip of a girl in town. Frederick fell in love with her when she was 17 and he 19 years old. He got a day set for their marriage, but just before it came Annie ran away to America. Her lover followed her, found her in New York city, and a marriage ceremony was again arranged for, when the girl disappeared again. This time she slipped back to England. He followed her and, after tramping up and down the country several weeks, found she had gone to the Continent. To the Continent went the constant lover, and for months she led him a will-o'-the-wisp chase from city to city. Finally she got back to Nottingham, and he caught her, and, before she could get away again, they were married. She made it conditional that they should go at once to America. They sailed for New York, and thence drifted to Chicago, where Frederick has been employed as bookkeeper. He says he has tramped 10,000 miles for his wife and is ready to tramp 10,000 more, if necessary.

Nuptial Arrangements—A New Fashion.

It is fashionable now for husbands and wives to keep separate bed-rooms. Kings and Queens have set the example, and the newly coupled folks in our fashionable world are following it. No secret is made of the custom. The nicest of our output of June brides will calmly show you her own daily boudoir, and then exhibit the bedroom of her husband. And the Duke of Marlborough and his bride, the beautiful Widow Hamersley, sailed away on their honeymoon voyages in two staterooms.

More than that, I have it from a positively trustworthy source that on the evening of the wedding, after the Clews dinner at Delmonico's which was concluded at 10.45 p. m., the chaperon, Mrs. Cruger, and the Duchess were driven in a carriage unattended to the Hamersley mansion on Fifth avenue, and the Duke, after passing some time with his friends in ordinary post-prandial entertainment, sought his quarters at the Albemarle Hotel. This was construed as ducal politeness.

The idea is that the bride must not be intruded upon, and that she must be left to invite her husband to call sooner or later, as the fancy suits her. In one instance the wedded couple went right away on diverse tours, to meet at the end of a week in some distant place, the locality being kept a secret from their acquaintances.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Seasonable Dainties.

A delicious dish for this season is red raspberry. Take a quart of the fruit, and after looking it over carefully put into a sauce-pan with a half cup of boiling water. When it boils add a half cup of white sugar and the same quantity of red currants off the stem.

In a pudding dish beat up the yolks of three eggs with a pint of milk and three tablespoonfuls of sugar. Stir in the berries and place in a moderate oven to bake. It should be done in about a half hour. Just before removing spread on top the whites fo the eggs beaten to a stiff froth with two tablespoonfuls of sugar. Let it get delicately brown and serve ice-cold. Blackberry pudding may be made in the same way.

For a tea dish blackberries mixed with currants and served with powdered sugar and cream are delicious, and are much nicer than the berries plain.

A simple huckleberry pudding, especially good for children, is made as follows: Get a pint of the berries and put into a deep fruit dish. Make a custard out of a pint of milk, brought to a boil, into which two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch is stirred. Sweeten to taste and pour over the berries; eat cold.

THE SINKING FRENCH COAST.

A Prediction that Paris will be Submerged in Ten Centuries.

Just lately, says a writer in the London Globe, on the coast of Brittany, one of those geolocial discoveries has been made which suggest to the mind periods of time making the longest human life appear but a span, and exhibiting processes quite dwarfing the most ambitious human achievements. This is the disclosure, by the displacement of a mass of sand during the last high tides, of a forest that must have been buried for some twenty centuries at least. The situation is just opposite Saint Malo, at the foot of the cliffs of Saint Enogat and Saint Lunaire. The forest is supposed to have once extended from Saint Malo to beyond Mount Saint Michel. This discovery is considered of great scientific interest, as it affords a remarkable illustration of the gradual sinking of the French shore. The progress of this sinking during the last 2,000 years is clearly shown in an old map found at the abbey of the Mount Saint Michel. Within no more than seven centuries back as many as seven parishes are said to have disappeared by the subsidences of this region. And in the Bay of Douarnenzes there is known to have existed in the fifth century quite a flourishing town called Is, the scene of the famous tragical legend. Even now, at low water, may be seen the old walls of Is, which are called by the inhabitants Mogber Greghi (wall of the Greek). The people of the country pretend that they can sometimes hear the old church bells of the submerged city ringing with the motion of the current. French geologists estimate that the gradual sinking of the soil of Britanny, Normandy, Artais, Belgium and Holland is not less than seven feet a century. At this rate it is calculated that in about ten centuries all the channel ports will be destroyed, and Paris itself will become a maritime city. In another ten centuries it is predicted that the French capital itself will have become entirely submerged, excepting, perhaps, that the tops of the Pantheon, of the Arc de Triomphe and some other monuments may be discernible at low water by the people who will then be living.

Why the Romans Went to Bed Early.

History tells us that ancient Rome, even in times of festival, was always as quiet as the grave after the closing in of the night—a fact which De Quincy thus accounts for: "They went to bed early in those ages simply because their mother earth could not afford them candles. She, good old lady, or young lady (for geologists know not whether she is in that state of her progress which corresponds to gray hairs, or to infancy, or to 'a certain age') she, good lady, would have shuddered to hear any of her nations inquiring for candles. 'Candles, indeed!' she would say, who ever heard of such a thing? and with so much excellent daylight running to waste as I have provided gratis? What will the wretches want next?' The Romans, therefore, who saw no joke in sitting around a table in the dark, went off to bed as the darkness began. Everybody did so. Old Numa Pompilious himself was obliged to trundle off into the dark. Tarquinius may have been a very superb fellow, but I doubt whether he ever saw a farthing rushlight. And though it may be thought that plots and conspiracies would flourish in such a city of darkness, it is to be considered that the conspirators themselves had no more candles than honest men; both parties were in the dark."

Did Not Like the New House.

The Boston Advertiser says: A well-known Boston gentleman keeps pigeons at his country place near Milton. The birds lived in the barn until recently, when he built a new hen-house, with a dove-cote in its second story. The barn was then boarded up, and the pigeons invited to enter their new home. They unitedly refused, and slept in the trees for a week. Then a consultation was held, and all but one adopted the new abode. The one stalwart stayed in the trees a few days longer, and then was seen to fly a great height in the air and disappear. Some days later he turned up in Waltham, where he was recognized by a man who had reared him, and who had marked his wing. The bird had been near Milton for nearly two years, and had originally been brought there from Waltham in a closed basket.

An Alaska Indian, sentenced to prison for 99 years for murder, interrupted the judge by asking if the Government was going to keep him alive long enough to serve the whole term, or would they let him out when he died.

FOUND IN THE ROCK'S HEART.

A Steed and His Rider, Who Had Been Hidden There for Years.

Henry Martin, who resides up in the direction of Antelope Basin, Wyoming Territory, recently came across a ghastly relic of early days which might well form the foundation for a tale of frontier life. He was out prospecting in a wild and broken part of the country, where in the midst of an elevated plateau it is not uncommon to suddenly find oneself on the brink of a crevasse or cleft in the rock, a plunge into which would inevitably prove fatal, says the Laramie Boomerang. It was in examining one of these strange openings formed during some tremendous convulsion of the earth ages ago that Mr. Martin saw pinned between the adamantine walls far below him the whitened bones of a man and horse. He made a circuitous journey around the hill which brought him to where it was possible to enter the narrow gorge, and by difficult climbing over jagged boulders to reach the skeletons. He cautiously picked his way through for a distance of several hundred feet, and at length reached the object which had excited his curiosity. There was no doubt, from the position of the animal and his rider, that they had plunged headlong to their death either while being pursued or in some mad ride which did not leave time to check themselves on the brink of the yawning chasm. The man must have been fully six feet in height, and between 50 and 60 years of age, the latter supposition being established by the fact that he had during life lost some of his teeth and the bone had grown over the cavities afterwards. The skull showed a rather intelligent forehead, the cheek-bones were prominent and the general shape of the head indicated that the bones were those of a Mexican. This theory was confirmed by the discovery of a rich Mexican sombrero, with heavy gold trimmings, all in a good state of preservation. The skeleton was found in a perpendicular position, the head downwards and tightly pinned between the two walls of rock. The rider had fallen from his stead and the bones of the latter were similarly suspended, but twenty feet further up. In a little basin at the foot of the gorge was discovered a copper plate about six inches square, and strangest of all, a plug of tobacco of apparently ancient manufacture, but seemingly as perfect as when the dead man had put it in his pocket to solace him in his lonely ride across the hills.

Mental Effects of Hot Weather.

One of the most interesting studies bearing upon this subject (of the relation of mind to matter) is found in observing the effects of a high temperature upon different organizations. The nervous, sensitive, egotistic man, when the thermometer ranges among the nineties, is chiefly intent upon publishing his personal discomfort. Instead of sitting still and cooling his mind through work or genial diversion, he moves busily about telling everybody how hot he is, with gestures and ejaculations to match. He is a mental radiator, bent upon transmitting his own conditions to other minds, and without intending it is generating his own discomfort within others. On the other hand, the man of even temperament, of cool mind, avoids all mention of physical and thermal conditions on a hot day. He purposes to get his mind as far away from them as possible. He hears his nervous friend fling down his pen or spade and declare that it is too hot for work. To him congenial work is the very best means of keeping his attention away from physical discomfort. One feels comparatively cool in this man's presence. He is a partial refrigerator and transmits his own conditions.

The mere physical temperature of a man on a hot day is not the measure of discomfort. In this busy season hundreds of Canadian farmers toil in open fields in the hot sun in such excessive perspiration that hardly a dry thread is found on them through the day. But if one is accosted from the roadside and reminded that it is a terribly hot day he will generally reply with drollery that it is splendid weather for corn. The farmer's mind is on the hay and corn crops instead of on the heat. His mind is kept cool by congenial labor and the promise of good crops. What is true of man is true of beasts. One of the most painful sights to a person of kind heart is to see the distress of the horses that pull the street cars on a scorching day. These animals receive the best of care and treatment by the companies, and their muscular strength is not overtaxed so far as mere work is concerned. A horse doing the same work on a country road would not perspire much. It is the tremendous strain upon their nerves caused by constant fear of losing their feet on the smooth paving when starting the car that chiefly induces both their sweat and semi torture. Even with a horse it is the condition of mind that largely decides its power to endure heat and work.

Killed by Cherry Stones.

The practice of swallowing cherry stones caused the death of 17-year-old Pauline Wurster at her home, No. 148 Dauphin street, on Monday, after an illness of a week. Dr. Forman, the coroner's physician, yesterday made a post mortem examination and found that peritonitis had been caused by cherry stones. The little tubelike appendix suspended from the junction of the large and small intestines, the use of which physiologists have never been able to discover, was found choked up with cherry stones. The lower end of it had become ulcerated and had also been ruptured by the pressure of the stones, and the contents of the intestines as well as the stones escaped into the cavity of the bowels, producing violent inflammation.—Philadelphia Record.

Dying of a Spider's Bite.

Mr. Russell, the engineer of the pile-driver at work on the track of the "O.K." line at Milan, has met with a singular misfortune. A few days ago, while at work he drank water out of a dipper and felt a sting in the end of his tongue. Looking into the dipper he noticed a spider in it. At first he took no notice of the bite, but his tongue commenced to swell and soon became so large that it filled his mouth. A doctor was summoned and he did all in his power to relieve the suffering of Mr. Russell, but all his efforts were ineffectual, and on Wednesday his condition was so critical that his wife and child, who live in this city, were sent for.—Quincy (Ill.) Whig.

BIRDS FOND OF MIRRORS.

They Will Wash Themselves There, and Play with the Reflected Image.

Do you know that the little canaries you keep in cages are fond of mirrors, asks a correspondent of Youth's Instructor. We have seen little girls, and older ones, too, who were fond of mirrors, but who ever heard of birds that used them? I will tell you about a little canary that lives at the house where I board. Some time ago our landlady got a canary and put it in a cage alone. The little bird was taken from a large cage holding a dozen birds. He was very homesick and lonesome, just as you would be if you were taken away off among strangers, away from mamma, papa, sisters, brothers and everybody you ever knew. Just so our little birdie cried and moaned, and would not eat nor sing. It wanted to go home and see its mamma. The lady did all she could to comfort and make it feel at home. She talked to it and petted it, giving it clean water, good seed, apples and everything she thought it would like, but it was of no use; birdie kept crying and wouldn't make friends, but wanted to go home. One day his mistress brought him a large piece of broken mirror, as big as my two hands, and placed it inside his cage where he could see it readily. Do you suppose he cared for that? Indeed he did. He hopped down and, going up close, looked in, seeming to be perfectly delighted. He chirped and hopped about, singing and putting on all the airs he was master of. He was not homesick at all after that. He spends much of his time before the glass, and when he goes to sleep at night he will cuddle down just as close to the glass as he can get. You see, he thinks he is sleeping beside that other little bird. His mistress often lets him out into the room, where he can have more liberty. She may put that glass anywhere in the room, and he will find it and spend most of his time before it. One day the little fellow acted very naughtily. He got angry and tried to get into a fight. It all happened because he wanted his own way and could not get it. He went up to the glass so lovingly and tried to coax the other bird to come and play with him somewhere else. The looking-glass bird would not follow him, but went the other way every time. Then the canary got provoked, and flying at the bird in the glass tried to have a real fight with him. He tried it only once, and then he looked ashamed of it. The blame, you see, was all on one side. That shows how foolish it is to get angry and pick a quarrel. He washes himself before the large mirror in the room, pluming his feathers and making his toilet with much satisfaction; and, like all folks that spend much time before the glass, he is getting very vain.

Bringing Debtors to Terms.

A Paris tradesman has invented a new device for dealing with a recalcitrant debtor which may become common. A gentleman who, to use a rather hackneyed phrase, is well known on the turf, had the misfortune to lose a large sum of money at the races, and rumors as to his solvency were soon spread about the city. Applications were at once made to him by his numerous creditors, and he succeeded in coming to satisfactory arrangements with all of them except one on whose books he was down for a mere trifle of £1,200. The creditor refused to compound, and wanted the money at once. As his debtor was unable to "come up to the scratch" the tradesman threatened to send out advertisement vans and "sandwich men" over the city to emblazon the insolvency of the gentleman well known on the turf, who was also a Knight of the Legion of Honor, before the eyes of all men, women and children. This did not in the least alarm the debtor, who evidently regarded the threat as a gigantic joke. To his surprise and vexation, however, the "sandwich men" are let loose on the metropolis. They carried boards and banners with inscriptions thereon setting forth the name, titles, qualities and liabilities of the debtor. With these they marched one fine day along the Boulevard des Italiens, and, diving down the Rue de Richelieu, they made for the Stock Exchange, round which they walked silently and solemnly three times. After that they returned to the Boulevards, passed the Madeleine, traversed the Place de la Concorde and proceeded slowly and steadily up the crowded Avenues des Champs Elysees, where their terrible inscriptions were paraded before the gaze of nymphs and noceurs who were going out to the Bois, of quiet political or professional people who were taking their daily drives in the same direction, and of the hordes of mothers, nurses and children who usually congregate on fine afternoons in the same pleasant part of Paris. This was too much for the debtor, who summoned his tormentor before the Parquet on the ground of his trying to obtain money under false pretences. This dispute was too peculiar and unprecedented for the Magistrate, who postponed their verdict.

Munchausen Outdone.

In the forest of Esterel a man and woman were at work, recently, and not far off a babe—an infant six months old—was lying in its cradle, which had been moved to the front of their cottage in order that the little cherub might inhale the fresh air under the watchful gaze of its fond parents. Suddenly a noise was heard, and an enormous eagle, swooping down from the cerulean sky, seized the babe with beak and claws and began to soar once more toward the sun, when the distracted father, rushing madly into his hut, took up his gun. Without a moment's hesitation the man pointed his weapon at the cruel bird and fired. The eagle dropped earthward as dead as a door nail, and its slayer now achieved another feat that would have won him any amount of applause at Lord's. He held out his hands and caught the child as it fell, the little one escaping without so much as a scratch, and returning from its journey into mid-air as "bright as a button." So Tell of immortal renown has a rival. The only drawback is that a skeptic has hinted that if it were carefully examined the majestic bird might prove, after all, to be only a canard.—London Telegraph.

Pomposity with an Unimpeachable P.

New Boarder—"What a pompous-looking man that Mr. Darby is; don't you think so?" Old Boarder—"Pompous! I guess you'd look pompous if you'd captured the strawberry out of the shortcake for three successive days the way he has!"—Judge.

FACTS FOR MEN OF ALL AGES.
DISEASES OF MAN.
M. V. LUBON'S SPECIFIC NO. 8,
THE GREAT HEALTH RENEWER,
Marvel of Healing, and Kohinoor of Medicines,
Cures the terrible consequences of Indiscretion, Exposure and Overwork.

YOUNG, MIDDLE-AGED AND OLD MEN

Who are broken down from the effects of abuse will find in No. 8 a radical cure for nervous debility, organic weakness, involuntary vital losses, etc.

SYMPTOMS FOR WHICH No. 8 SHOULD BE USED.—Want of energy, vertigo, want of purpose, dimness of sight, aversion to society, want of confidence, avoidance of conversation, desire for solitude, listlessness and inability to fix the attention on a particular subject, cowardice, depression of spirits, giddiness, loss of memory, excitability of temper, spermatorrhœa, or loss of the seminal fluid—the result of self-abuse or marital excess—impotency, insanity, consumption, epilepsy, fits, nervousness, sleeplessness, dyspepsia, biliousness, blotches on the face, pimples, blood poisoning, nocturnal emissions, premature decay, insufficiency, nervousness, exhaustion, barrenness, palpitation of the heart, hysteric feelings in females, trembling, melancholy, disturbing dreams etc., are all symptoms of this terrible evil, oftentimes innocently acquired. In short, the spring of vital force having lost its tension, every function wanes in consequence. Scientific writers and the superintendents of insane asylums unite in ascribing to the effects of self-abuse the great majority of wasted lives which come under their notice. If you are incompetent for the arduous duties of business, incapacitated for the enjoyments of life, No. 8 offers an escape from the effects of early vice. If you are advanced in years, No. 8 will give you full vigor and strength. If you are broken down, physically and morally from early indiscretion, the result of ignorance and folly, send your address and 10 cents in stamps for M. V. Lubon's Treatise in Book Form on Diseases of Men. Sealed and secure from observation. Address all communications to M. V. LUBON, 47 Wellington St. E., Toronto.

A Man without wisdom lives in a fool's paradise. CURES GUARANTEED. HEAL THE SICK.

Clipped and Condensed from the Columns of Our Exchanges.

A son of Mr. Hector Stewart, of Bentick, was carring a scythe last week when he fell and cut his hand half off. Dr. Gun dressed the wound and hopes to save all the boy's fingers.—[Grey Review.

Our exchanges are cautioning ministers against too lengthy sermons during the summer months. Josh Billings once said that a minister who couldn't strike ile in thirty minutes should change his business.—[Pickering News.

There was a very destructive fire in Creemore on the morning of the 17th inst. Messrs. Gillespie and Casy's block was reduced to ashes. Loss estimated at $20,000. Supposed to have been the work of an incendiary.

Mr. Richardson's farm house and buildings, near Corbetton, were entirely consumed by fire last Friday afternoon, caused by a spark wafted by the wind from a fallow distant about four hundred yards, settling near an old straw stack which almost immediately ignited.—[Shelburne Economist.

On Monday evening last Harry Craig, a little fellow of eight years, second son Mr. Wm. Craig, photographer, was amusing himself by climbing in a new building while the workmen were absent. He lost his balance and fell to the ground from a second storey window. Strange to say he picked himself up, and beyond being rather sore and shaken up seems none the worse for his tumble.—[Owen Sound Advertiser.

PAINFUL ACCIDENT.—We regret to learn that on Monday last, the wife of Mr. Geo. Hendrie, Lake Shore line, Sydenham, near Annan, while standing near a mare feeding in the stable, was bitten by the animal, taking a piece out of the corner of her lower lip and tearing the lip to the chin. Mrs. Hendrie was immediately brought by her husband to Dr. Lang, who dressed the painful wound, and she is now doing as well as could be expected. The animal had hitherto been considered gentle and quiet.—[Owen Sound Times.

CAMPING QUARTETTE.—On Monday last Wes. Armstrong, E. E. Richardson and Charlie Sarjeant, of Flesherton, and Willie McFarland, of Markdale, four respectable youths, armed to the teeth with shooting irons, fully equipped with fishing tackle and their wagon so heavily laden with camp paraphernalia and provisions that two of the party had to walk, started for the famous Bell's Lake there to spend a week scalping Indians, hunting bears, netting fish, spearing frogs, bagging fowl and mashing mosquitoes. We hope their expectations may be fully realized and patiently wait for particulars of their exploits.—Markdale Standard.

Luxuriant Hair

Can only be preserved by keeping the scalp clean, cool, and free from dandruff, and the body in a healthful condition. The great popularity of Ayer's Hair Vigor is due to the fact that it cleanses the scalp, promotes the growth of the hair, prevents it from falling out, and gives it that soft and silky gloss so essential to perfect beauty.

Frederick Hardy, of Roxbury, Mass., a gentleman fifty years of age, was fast losing his hair, and what remained was growing gray. After trying various dressings with no effect, he commenced the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. "It stopped the falling out," he writes; "and, to my great surprise, converted my white hair (without staining the scalp) to the same shade of brown it had when I was 25 years of age."

Ten Years Younger.

Mrs. Mary Montgomery, of Boston, writes: "For years, I was compelled to wear a dress cap to conceal a bald spot on the crown of my head; but now I gladly lay the cap aside, for your Hair Vigor is bringing out a new growth. I could hardly trust my senses when I first found my hair growing; but there it is, and I am delighted. I look ten years younger."

A similar result attended the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor by Mrs. O. O. Prescott, of Charlestown, Mass., Miss Bessie H. Bedloe, of Burlington, Vt., Mrs. J. J. Burton, of Bangor, Me., and numerous others.

The loss of hair may be owing to impurity of the blood or derangement of the stomach and liver, in which case, a course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla or of Ayer's Pills, in connection with the Vigor, may be necessary to give health and tone to all the functions of the body. At the same time, it cannot be too strongly urged that none of these remedies can do much good without a persevering trial and strict attention to cleanly and temperate habits.

Death of Servant Stone.

On Saturday t, at his late residence, Artemesia, aft a brief illness of three days, died Servt Richard Stone, aged 42 years. Deced was an old resident of Artemesia l very highly respected. He became a ember of Flesherton Volunteer Comy in the year 1866 and never failed attend annual drill from that time to tday of his death, except on one or two occasions, when he could not possibly ad. He was a Christian in the highest best sense of that term. His death is ersally regretted in this district and wrever he was known. He was Sergt in No. 6 Company Volunteers, a member of the Orange order. On May last his remains were interred in e Flesherton cemetery, attended by largest funeral cortege ever seen in is locality. The last sad rites at the e were performed by the Orangemen the Volunteers under command of Lt. J. J. Field. Rev. J. W. Shilton, A., officiated Flesherton brass band led the procession.

Personal Paragraphs.

Mr. Hurd and family, of Toronto, are the guests of Mr. Thos. Duncan.

Mrs. James Kester and youngest daughter returned to Flesherton on Monday evening from visiting friends near Stouffville.

Mr. J. B. Spurr, of the Dundalk Herald, gave us a pleasant call on Monday last.

Booth, the Boss Barber, Flesherton, has his shop in Strain's block very attractively fitted up.

Mr. and Mrs. James Beecroft returned home from England last week. Their many friends were pleased to meet with them again, although very sorry to learn that the trip had not been as beneficial to Mr. Beecroft's health as had been anticipated. We hope, however, that good results will ultimately follow.

Fatality at a barn raising.

A fatal accident occurred at a barn raising, near Rocklyn, on Monday last. Deceased, whose name was John Shaw, fell from a beam, striking his head upon a brace. We have been unable to learn exact particulars, but believe death occured a few hours after the accident. Mr. Shaw was a bachelor.

Correct you are, Bro. Blyth.

The East Riding of Grey Agricultural Society will hold its fall exhibition in Flesherton, on Monday and Tuesday, September 24th and 25th. We have received a copy of the prize list, printed at the Advance office, in pamphlet form, and which for clearness of impression and neatness in its general make up would do credit to many offices in much large places. —[Chatsworth News.

Our Base Ball Club.

The Flesherton Base Ball Club has been re-organized. The following officers were elected for the season :

A. Munshaw, President.
C. J. Leitch, Captain.
G. H. Hawke, Sec.-Treas.
D. Clayton, Asst. Captain.
H. Hawke, C. W. Wright, and J. Davis, Working Committee

Now, ye clubs of surrounding towns and villages, prepare for the struggle.

Tramps Abroad.

The invasion of the Presbyterian church one night last week (which we omitted to mention in last week's issue) shows that the worst "species" of tramp is around again. More burglaries are committed by these fellows in the rural districts than by the professional [illegible] They they were not as successful as they anticipated on the occasion named, was due to the careful manner in which Mr. Neil always looks after everything connected with the church.

Eugenia and Redwing.

An exciting base ball match was played at Kimberley the other day, between Eugenia and Redwing clubs. At the end of the ninth inning the scores stood : Redwing, 18 runs ; Eugenia, 16 runs. It was one of the best amateur games ever played in the County. There were three "whitewashes" on each side, while the playing of both teams was brilliant throughout. Eugenia team had two men who never played in a match before, which, no doubt, had considerable to do with their defeat. The return match will be looked forward to with much interest.

Entrance Examination.

Of the 529 candidates who wrote at the recent entrance examinations at Owen Sound, Meaford, Durham and Markdale, only 111 were successful. 118 candidates wrote at Owen Sound, of which 47 were successful ; 56 at Meaford, of which 26 were successful ; 51 at Durham, of which 21 were successful ; and 34 at Markdale, of which 17 were successful. Of the six pupils sent up to Markdale by Mr. Irwin, Principal of Flesherton Pubic Schools, five passed, viz., Lou Armstrong, Bert Armstrong, Lewis Ludlow, Frank Sullivan, and Martha Beatty—very creditable, indeed, to Mr. Irwin. Frank Sullivan stood fifth highest on the whole list of successful candidates. We congratulate the successful pupils, and, at same time, bid the unsuccessful ones "be of good cheer"—"there's a good time coming."

At Mulmur Lake.

TO MISS MARION MCDONALD.

I have forgotten many things
And forms and faces of the past,
But time can never do away
With ONE remembrance—this shall last.

That summer day at Mulmur Lake—
The friends that met—the songs we sang—
The words we spoke in kindly mirth—
The pressure of the hands we wrung,—

Are not forgotten. Time shall pass
And with it other memories take,
But this is painted in my soul—
That summer day at Mulmur LAKE.

In changeful gleams those waters meet,—
A varying green, now dark, now light;
A fitful, rare, mysterious hue,
Here strangely deep, there softly bright.

A weirdness overhung it all,
A sense of awe my spirit knew;
Yet, mingled with that dread, I felt
A thrill of rapture at the view.

The solemn silence on the shore,
Broken at times by some sweet song—
The dip of oars—the waters' plash—
The echo from the hills among,—

Come to me in the quiet hours,
And thus doth fancy sweetly take
Me back to other scenes and sounds—
That summer day at Mulmur Lake.

And we that met—Ah! strangely, too,
From far apart we gathered there!
Some from the City of the West
And some our own Canadian fair,

And shall we ever meet again
To kindly greet—the hand to take?
And to recall those pleasant hours
That summer day at Mulmur Lake?

We know not. But a prayer I frame,—
In sweet sincerity 'tis given
May we, if meeting not on Earth,
Meet where no parting is—in Heaven

Bro. W. Doll, now of Winnipeg, formerly of Port Perry, and a member of the Masonic lodge here, gave instruction to a friend here, a member of the lodge, to entertain the brethren of the lodge at his (Bro. Doll's) expense, as a manifestation of his fraternal regard for the members of his mother lodge.

The entertainment took place on the evening of Friday, 22nd inst., and took the form of a conversazione. The W. M Bro. Prince, occupied the chair. Several brethren made highly complimentary remarks on the genuine worth of the generous entertainer—as a true man and a worthy Mason.

All, not alone his "brethren of the mystic tie," but all acquainted with Bro Doll, are greatly pleased to learn that he is prospering admirably in his adopted home.—Port Perry Standard.

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.

Gentlemen:—A sense of gratitude and the desire to render a service to the public impel me to make the following statements:

My college career, at New Haven, was interrupted by a severe cold which so enfeebled me that, for ten years, I had a hard struggle for life. Hemorrhage from the bronchial passages was the result of almost every fresh exposure. For years I was under treatment of the ablest practitioners without avail. At last I learned of which I used (moderately and in small doses) at the first recurrence of a cold or any chest difficulty, and from which I invariably found relief. This was over 25 years ago. With all sorts of exposure, in all sorts of climates, I have never, to this day, had any cold nor any affection of the throat or lungs which did not yield to AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL within 24 hours.

Of course I have never allowed myself to be without this remedy in all my voyages and travels. Under my own observation, it has given relief to vast numbers of persons; while in acute cases of pulmonary inflammation, such as croup and diphtheria in children, life has been preserved through its effects. I recommend its use in light but frequent doses. Properly administered, in accordance with your directions, it is in any house. I speak earnestly because I feel earnestly. I have known many cases of apparently confirmed bronchitis and cough, with loss of voice, particularly among clergymen and other public speakers, perfectly cured by this medicine. Faithfully yours,

C. EDWARDS LESTER.

A Legend.

A lovely woman in an eastern land
Once swayed a kingdom with her slender hand;
Her burdens heavy grew and weighed her down,
Upon her brow there pressed a jewelled crown.

Too cumbersome for its tender resting place,
The golden weight adorned a weary face;
She cried: "I have grown tired of my power.
It seemeth more unbearable each hour.

"Let some one come that I may crown him king
Within his hand he must a guerdon bring
That shall by far my boundless wealth exceed.
So, having it, I'll feel no other need.

Her wish was known, and lo! from far and near
There thronged around her poet, prince and peer,
With offerings of dazzling beauty wrought
In wondrous shapes and with deep meanings fraught.

They laid their gifts down humbly at her feet.
She sighed: "Alas! I find them incomplete.
Within these sparkling stones no solace lies;
I dream of wealth revealed in human eyes."

Morn after morn a suppliant went away
Until there came unto her throne one day
A man with empty hands, yet noble face
And form of matchless mold and peerless grace

The queen looked up and asked: "What gift hast thou
To tender for the crown upon my brow?"
He gazed within her eyes and naught replied.
She crowned him, saying: "I am satisfied."

SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulness.

CHAPTER XLVI.

Lee Park—Lord Lee's estate of Adinbrooke—presented a scene of unusual animation on that winter morning when Sir Frederic Oliphant drove his daughter and Jack Ross past the school-house over the hill; for the weather, though bitterly cold, was bright, and the sun was shining on the lake, on which a crowd of skaters were disporting themselves. Lee Park was not so remarkable for its extent as for the beauty of its situation. It lay in a valley with hills on three sides of it, while the mansion itself was built on the rising ground at the back. The lake lay quite in the hollow, and the sun glinted through the tall skeleton trees, on which the hoar-frost glittered and sparkled like diamonds. The ice was perfectly safe, and a quaint, little chalet on the banks of the lake afforded accommodation to the chaperons and lookers-on. Bright fires were blazing in the two little rooms, and refreshments were provided for the skaters, who, numbering fully fifty, were enjoying themselves thoroughly.

It was a bright, animated, pretty sight, and sufficiently unfamiliar to Jack Ross to have an additional charm in his eyes. The bright faces, the ladies' pretty skating-costumes, the snow-covered hills around, the ruddy light thrown from the fires in the chalet over the frozen lake, the glimpses of vivid color here and there from a bright hued shawl, or wrap or rug, thrown upon the hard ground, the merry voices and laughter, all contributed to make the scene one of unusual interest and brightness in Jack's sight.

But there was another reason for everything looking couleur de rose in Mr. Ross' sight on that fine sunshiny morning. The few words he had exchanged with Guy Stuart on the terrace at Erindale had cheered him wonderfully. He had fallen in love with Madge almost at first sight; the little tricks of speech and manner which the young girl had quite unconsciously acquired during her intimacy with Shirley gave her an additional charm for Jack; and, before many days had elapsed of his vistit at Cotsford, where he had met her, he was irretrievably in love. At first he had given himself up to his happiness without a thought; but then it struck him that Sir Frederic Oliphant's only daughter and heiress might justly aspire to a wealthier and more highly placed husband. After all, he had but little to offer a woman whom he loved; his income, handsome though it was, depended a great deal on his residence in India; and how could he expect that Sir Frederic and Lady Oliphant would allow their darling to accompany him thither, even if Madge loved him enough to risk the perils of a voyage and to give up all her dear ones for his sake?

He had been very heavy-hearted when Sir Frederic and his daughter had left Cotsford, and he had been undecided as to the prudence of accepting the invitation to Erindale which Sir Frederic had given him with unusual cordiality, and which Madge had seemed to second with a glance from her sweet eyes. At first he had concluded that it was better to refuse; then he decided that, cost what it might, he would not deprive himself of the happiness a few days more of her society would give him; and, since the danger only touched himself, the happiness was worth the risk.

And, when he saw Madge in her own home, he loved her all the more deeply. When he saw her with her father, so bright and sweet and frank, and with her mother, so tender and careful and loving, the affection he had already conceived for her grew deeper and more intense; and he felt that there could be no happiness for him on earth if she did not share his life.

Jack's early manhood had been a solitary one, for although he had made many acquaintances in India, he had made no friends; and for many a long month after he had left England he had been weighed down by a sense of remorse and shame for the wrong he had committed, and which had caused his sister such bitter woe. He had not known the real extent of the misery which her visit to Dumlfe had wrought for Shirley; but he had seen how terribly she had suffered at the thought of his disgrace, and in many a solitary hour during his voyage out to India he had dwelt with shame and horror on the depth of sinfulness into which he had fallen, and from which poor Shirley had rescued him at such a cost to herself; and he made a firm resolve to keep in the narrow path of honor for the future.

He had left England for his post at Calcutta just before the time fixed for his sister's marriage, and, knowing that she was betrothed to and professed a passionate love for Major Stuart, he was not a little surprised to receive a few lines from his uncle, Sir Gilbert, telling him that Shirley was now Lady Glynn. The note gave him no particulars, and he had to fill in all the details for himself. He fancied that there was no difficulty in doing this, for he had seen Sir Hugh's evident devotion to his sister, and he remembered his own expressed regret at her engagement to Major Stuart. Shirley was very young, he thought, and like many other girls before her, she had accepted the first offer made to her, and, repenting afterward of having done so, Guy Stuart had released her from her promise. Jack thought the marriage had taken place rather too soon perhaps; but, after all, Shirley was not very happy at Fairholme Court.

Shirley had been married some few months before she wrote to her brother, and then she said nothing about the circumstances of her marriage, nor did she say much, Jack noticed, about her domestic happiness. He knew that her husband was wealthy and most indulgent, and on several occasions Sir Hugh himself had written a few cordial lines asking him to return home even for a time; but Jack resisted the invitation all the more easily because Shirley did not second it warmly. Sometimes he had seen his sister's name in the papers as being present at some stately entertainment or in a list of distinguished guests at a country house, and he had had some undefined idea that she was not very happy; but in her letters to him she had never hinted at any unhappiness, and he had not asked her any questions.

Sir Hugh's death, the news of which reached him not only from private correspondents, but through the medium of the press, had startled and shocked him terribly, and he had read with mingled indignation, horror, and wonder the account of Guy's trial for the murder of the friend who had betrayed him. At the time, he was making preparations to return to England; but the illness of his senior partner had detained him, so that he arrived in England only to find that his sister had disappeared and that every search had been completely unavailing.

Jack's anguish at these tidings was acute and bitter; and, when he heard from Oswald Fairholme the circumstances of Shirley's marriage, his remorse was great. All the suffering which she had endured had been caused by him—the brother who loved her, and to whom she was so tenderly attached. He had at once confessed to Guy the motive of Shirley's presence at Dumfife, and Guy's gray eyes had flashed at the thought of how cruelly poor Shirley had been betrayed.

"If I had known that," he said, in a low, deep tone of pain, "I should have found it much harder to forgive him even than I had already. Heaven knows," he added, brokenly, "if I did not murder him in deed, I had slain him in my heart more than once."

Between Jack Ross and Major Stuart a warm friendship had arisen. It had begun, as was natural, in their great mutual attachment to Shirley and their ceaseless anxiety about her welfare, and it had increased as they grew to know each other better and discovered the noble and endearing qualities each possessed. Another great bond of union between them was their loneliness, which drew them daily closer together. Every one of the few who had maintained their friendship for Guy had other ties; Oswald Fairholme had his wife and children and the superintendence of his estate, for Sir Gilbert had died in the winter, and his son had taken possession of Fairholme; while his mother and two younger girls had removed to London. And, although Jack would have been made welcome by his aunt, he felt that there was [illegible] duality between them; and he was happier when with Guy.

It was a strange and touching bond which existed between them; and, although they never mentioned Shirley except when they were alone, she was constantly in their thoughts. Jack was inclined to despair sometimes, and say that she must be dead, or she would not leave them in such cruel suspense; but Guy, remembering a look in her eyes when they had parted, and those few heart-broken lines she had written, felt that surely "Heaven would be merciful, and let them meet again."

But Jack was not thinking of his sister on that bright winter day when he knelt at Madge Oliphant's feet to put on her skates. For once Shirley was forgotten, with all the misery of the past and the wretched uncertainty of the present. Guy's words had lifted a load from the young man's heart, and he felt unusually cheerful and light-hearted. Something, too, in Madge Oliphant's manner, in the look in her blue eyes, made him hope that he was not quite indifferent to her, and it was a bright as well as a handsome face which looked up at hers with such significance in the earnest tender eyes. Jack Ross was feeling what the quaint old song so well expresses:

"To-day, to-day, where'er I pass,
A glory lightens through the grass,
A glory weights the flower;
A glory lies on the shining grass.
A glory crowns the burnished flower

"To-day, to-day, where'er I look,
Soft laughter dimples o'er the brook;
Glad smiles break on the air;
Light laughter shines o'er the wimpling brook,
And smiles shine out in the sunny air."

Never had scenery looked so lovely to Jack as that of Lee Park, never had their been such a delightful piece of ice to skate upon as the lake; never had there been such a bright sky; and, above all, never had man had a sweeter companion to skate with than Madge Oliphant! It was not that she was a very graceful and capable skater; Madge, like many other English girls, was only sufficiently adept to glide smoothly over the lake, and she was, moreover, rather timid. It was very delightful to Jack—himself an accomplished a skater as any Canadian could be—to feel the little hands tightening over his arm, and to meet the sweet alarmed blue eyes as they looked up confidingly into his, and Madge had never had so careful and expert and tender a teacher as she found in him; while Sir Frederic, having satisfied himself that his daughter was in good hands, sauntered off with Lord Lee to the house for a quiet talk.

"You are getting on famously, Miss Oliphant," said Jack, as they rested for a few moments. "If the ice continues for a few days more you will have mastered the outside edge!"

"Thank you!" cried Madge, brightly. "I am afraid I must be a terrible bore, Mr. Ross. You cannot possibly enjoy yourself towing me about like this."

"Can't I?" Jack said, smiling into the demure blue eyes. "At any rate, I manage to bear the infliction with equanimity."

"That is so considerate of you," Madge rejoined, lightly. "Confess, though, that you would much prefer gliding off by yourself."

"Why should I confess to what certainly would not be true, Miss Oliphant?"

"Would it not? It is really very good of you to help me!"

"It is very good of you to let me do so," Jack answered, with an involuntary pressure of the little hand which still lay in his, "I see scores of envious individuals looking after us."

"Young ladies envying me your assistance," Madge replied, demurely, looking at him for a moment.

"No; young men envying me the happiness of assisting you," he answered earnestly; and the sweet saucy blue eyes dropped under his earnest glance.

"Shall we go on, Mr. Ross?" she said, a little abruptly.

"If you have rested," he answered, rather regretfully.

"Oh, I have quite rested! But perhaps you are tired of being a 'support.'"

"You know that I am not," he replied; and they glided away together, many eyes, as he had said, following them with envious or admiring looks, for Miss Oliphant, both as beauty and heiress, had a little train of admirers who usually followed her and danced attendance upon her; and some of the young ladies of the neighborhood would not have been averse from a flirtation with the handsome, fair-haired, bronzed stranger who seemed to have eyes for no one but Madge.

After one or two rounds of the lake, Madge sat down on a safety apparatus of peculiar construction in which Lord Lee had great faith, but which had not had a chance of proving its utility; and Jack, standing beside her, looked down on the pretty flushed face and graceful figure with a world of longing and love in his blue eyes.

"Do you know that you look like Balzac's femme peinte par elle meme?" he said, smiling, after a minute's silence.

"Do I?" she answered, laughing, and putting up her hands to her face with the prettiest, shyest gesture possible.

"Ah, I know, that rouge won't come off," he said, lightly. "I am glad to see that you are not very tired."

"I am not a bit tired," she answered, gayly. "But I am wondering what has become of mamma and Guy."

"Perhaps Lady Oliphant was tired, and preferred to go back."

"I should not be a bit surprised. Will you not sit down, Mr. Ross?"

"Thank you," Jack answered, and took the offered seat by her side; then Madge's roses deepened and Mr. Ross's blue eyes looked as if nothing could induce them to leave her face.

For a few minutes neither spoke; a sudden fit of dumbness seemed to have fallen on the pretty chatterbox by Jack's side, and he himself was at no time a great talker. Still it was he who broke this silence first.

"Miss Oliphant," he said, rather unsteadily, "may I tell you an episode of my past life?"

Madge started, and the pretty roses faded a little.

"It is something that I want you to know," he said, very gently; "for, although our acquaintance has not been a long one, I should like you to know the worst of me at once."

"The worst!" Madge said, looking startled. "[illegible] my poor sister's story—do you not?"

Madge hesitated.

"I know that she was engaged to poor Guy, and that she married Sir Hugh Glynn," she said, gently; "but that is all—and that she was very unhappy."

"Her life was spoiled through my fault," said Jack, gravely. "Had I been an honest man, Shirley would have been a happy woman now."

"An honest man!" Madge repeated, gently, not shrinking from him as he had expected her to do.

"Yes. Let me tell you," he said, eagerly; "and, when I have related it to you, you will know why I wished you to hear the story."

He told her gravely and earnestly, without trying to excuse or palliate his own wrong-doing, of the foolish and guilty action which had so nearly been his ruin, and which indirectly had caused all poor Shirley's misery; and Madge listened with a touched, sorrowful expression on her face and a deep sympathy in the blue eyes which, so bright when he began, were dim and misty when he ended. It was a painful story; and the revelation of her own feelings toward Jack which had come to her that morning made her feel for the suffering Shirley had endured, and helped her perhaps to understand it better than she could otherwise have done.

"Ah, poor thing, poor thing," she said brokenly. "How terrible for her, loving one man to be married to another."

"Yes, and married by a fraud, by a—He is dead—I would not speak in anger now," Jack said, checking himself suddenly. "And you see it was all my fault, Miss Oliphant."

"Yes," Madge said very softly; "but, however great a fault, it is never too great for repentance, if you repented it sorely."

"My repentance could not give Shirley back her lost happiness," he exclaimed gloomily. "When I think," he added, with sudden passion, "of the lives blighted by my sin, it—"

"Hush, hush!" Madge said gently. "You must not talk so. You must try to forget it. Your sister suffered in silence, that this burden of remorse might not be laid upon you; is it right of you, or grateful toward her, to go on burning all your days for a sin which you have so repented?"

"And she—Heaven bless her!—so atoned for," he ejaculated bitterly; and they were silent for a space, during which Madge's heart, in her pity for the pain on his handsome face, stole out of her keeping and passed into his forever.

"Must I tell you the reason for making this confession to you, Miss Oliphant," he said tremulously "that or have you guessed that only to one woman whom I loved with all my heart I wished to make my wife, should I confess that episode of my life? Is it presumption to tell you that, unworthy, utterly unworthy as I am, I love you, that I shall ever love any but yourself? Nay, do not answer me yet; I know," he continued hastily, "that you cannot love me yet; but may I try to win you? I think Sir Fred would not object; if you give me leave I will speak to him—and—Madge"—his voice was broken and unsteady now in great earnestness—"I think the hope of winning you—only the hope—would make a new man. I think I could forget in a measure the misery of my past. I could take my stand among my fellows without feeling shamed and humiliated. Do you think—ah, do not answer me hastily!—that at any future time your feelings toward me will alter sufficiently to let me hope?"

The rose had deepened and faded, the sweet red lips were quivering a little as she listened, and the girl's warm heart was beating fast.

"No," she said softly; "I do not think they will."

Poor Jack turned white to the lips at the prompt and unexpected answer.

"Forgive me," he said tremulously, as soon as he could command his voice sufficiently to speak at all. "I was very wrong. I had no right—and—"

Madge turned to him with a little wonder in her eyes, and, seeing his agitation, guessed its cause. The color which had ebbed away came stealing back to her cheeks as she said softly—

"You ask me if my feelings will ever change toward you, and answer that I do not think they will; but—but—" She leaned toward him now, and her little hand stole into his; "Madcap" Madge had disappeared, and a gentle, tender, true-hearted woman was there in her stead, who said, in the sweetest words which had ever fallen upon Jack Ross's ear—"But why should you wish them to do so, since—since I love you, Jack?"

CHAPTER XLVII.

White as death, trembling in every limb, and with a world of startling horror in her eyes, Shirley looked up into the grave, tender, compassionate face bending over her, the face of the man whom she loved, and from whom, for that love's sake, she had fled—the man who was now, she believed, betrothed to Madge Oliphant; and, almost as pale, but less unnerved, he stood looking down upon her, noting with intense sorrow the changes which a year had wrought in her face. For a few moments he dared not trust his voice to speak; he was afraid he should break down, and he knew that she had already been dreadfully agitated and tried; and he mastered his own emotion out of pity for her.

"I did not think to find you here—and thus," he said gently; and the horror in the great hazel eyes grew even more intense as she answered him.

"And it would have been less hard to die than to see you here."

The words came slowly, one by one, from the parched livid lips, and each one fell upon Guy Stuart's heart painfully.

"Those are bitter words to hear," he said, in a voice of pain.

"Do you think they are not still more bitter to speak?" she asked, in the same slow fashion. "But they are true."

"True!" he repeated earnestly, a great sorrow in his gray eyes. "True from you to me, Shirley?"

"Yes."

He stooped over her, and tried to take the little trembling hands; but she shrunk back from him and rose to her feet, moving away from him backward, with her hands outstretched toward him, as if to keep him from her.

"No," she cried, in a shrill, unnatural voice. "Do not touch me—do not touch me!"

He stopped immediately, looking at her with unfeigned surprise and alarm. What strange reception was this from the woman who, when they had last met, had parted from him with her arms about his neck and her lips to his? What madness was this? Often, in the time of trouble which had followed her disappearance, he had wondered if his brain were giving away under the weight of anguish; and now, as he pushed his hair from his forehead with a troubled gesture of pain, he thought that he must be losing his senses.

"Why did you come?" she said brokenly. "Why did you not leave me alone?"

"Leave you alone!" he repeated after her. "Shirley, do you not know that for all these long weary months I have been doing my utmost to discover your whereabouts?"

"And yet you knew that I had come away to escape from you—to escape from you!"

She was standing by the wall now, leaning against it, and still holding out her hands with the same gesture of abhorrence, the same expression of horror in her eyes. Guy stood still by the table, resting his hand upon it, a great sorrow and pity upon his face and wonder deepening in the gray eyes.

A Good Suggestion.

The police authorities on the American side of the Niagara River have received orders to arrest all persons who may hereafter go there for the purpose of performing daring feats at the Falls. Now let our Provincial Government issue similar instructions, and an end will be put to the tragic follies which have been perpetrated by cranks who are not fit to take care of themselves. Like precautions need to be taken in connection with circus shows and certain industrial exhibitions.—St. Thomas Times.

DAY FIREWORKS.

Novelties in Pyrotechnics—Some Costly Display Pieces.

The Japanese day fireworks are coming into greater favor this year, says the New York Mail. Shells containing figures of animals, birds, fishes, dragons, caricatures of men and women and beautifully colored smoke effects are thrown from a mortar high into the air. Some of these figures are very odd. One shown the reporter represented a great red vase, the upper part of which contained a hideous face. Another was a monkey holding a big globe. Another was a Japanese woman dressed in a yellow gown and kneeling in great terror. Upon her head was a large rat. There was a figure made up of a big fish with a cat on its back, the cat holding reins run through the fish's mouth. A man riding a turtle and another riding a fish were odd figures, as were also elephants whose faces resembled the caricatures of Gen. Butler. The remarkable ingenuity of the Japanese in this kind of work was shown in other figures, such as the flags of all nations, groups of scorpions upheld by parasols, dice boxes, lamp-posts, an American Goddess of Liberty with a Japanese cast of countenance, figures of savage-looking Japanese officers, sailors in boats and like designs.

One of the oddest pieces is a colored "gallopade." It consists of a long drum, which turns on its centre with great rapidity, driving with much force wide spreading bursts and trails of brilliant fire, and forming a circle of dazzling effect. Within this circle of fire revolve, in contra directions, two wheels with illuminated centres of variegated colors, and which throw out jets of fire. The "Man in the Moon" is a novelty. It shows a large, round, laughing face, illuminated from behind with brilliant fire, showers of brilliant sparks being thrown from it in six directions. Other new designs for this season among the large exhibition pieces are "Boss Tweed's Diamond," a peacock's tail, Italian rosette, Egyptian pyramid, Chinese spider, Gothic cross, a revolving snowbake, a jewelled star, baskets of jewels, emerald jewels, Saxon pyramid, a puzzle wheel, "Star of America," "Cross of Honor," Egyptian mirage, Don Quixote's mill, "Shield of Iris," fairy dance, whirligig polka and G. A. R. motto.

The larger of these exhibition pieces cost from $60 to $150 each; the smaller from $10 to $50. Exhibition cases of fireworks, containing an assortment of pieces and bombs, rockets, Roman candles, etc., cost from $7.50 to $200 each. "Water fireworks" are an attractive novelty. They are made for use in water only, and consist of "diving devils," flying fish, "floating illuminators," Roman floaters, water volcanoes, spray fountains, jewelled fountains and water wheels.

A Dog Puzzled by Dress.

A cattle man from Arizona, William Wilson by name, has just come down to the city and brought with him a dog that would have delighted the heart of the author of "Sartor Resartus," for the animal flaunts a true Carlylean contempt for the flipperies of civilization and the useless adornment of clothes. Mr. Wilson sent Nugget, the dog, to board with a dog-fancier in a canine boarding-house, and then went to a clothing store and exchanged his cowboy's rig for new clothes of the latest cut. The next day he called on Nugget, but Nugget would have none of him. The master whistled to the dog, petted him and made every effort to make him understand that affection was not changed, even though clothes had been. The dog looked up at the silk hat which had taken the place of the broad-rimmed slouch to which he had been accustomed, sniffed at the dude-like cane, and surveyed the light trousers from several points of view, and then walked off to the corner of the room, lay down and gave a long, mournful howl. Mr. Wilson tried to coax him out of the corner, but could not. Nugget would look up at him with a knowing expression in his eye, and occasionally give the feeblest little wag to the end of his tail, but he could not be induced to reconsider his evident determination not to recognize his master in any such ridiculous attire as that. Mr. Wilson went to his hotel, donned his cowboy's rig again and then returned to Nugget's quarters. The instant the dog saw him he was almost wild with joy, and his delight at seeing his master again clothed as he thought a man ought to be was almost unbounded.—N. O. Times-Democrat.

He Wanted Noise.

Jinks—Are you going to Oconomowoc this summer, Jones, as you did last?

Jones—Heaven forbid, that place is too quiet.

Jinks—Too quiet. Why, I thought this was one of its principal attractions.

Jones—So it is for some families; but you never heard my wife scold. I am going to Niagara Falls where the roar of the waters is so loud that it drowns every other noise.

Jinks, who is contemplating matrimony, begins to whistle in a low tone, and the expression in his eyes has a far-away look that is painful.—Peck's Sun.

Expected Too Much.

Indignant Customer—I sent my little girl to your store an hour ago, sir, for twenty-five cents worth of carbolic acid, diluted four-fifths with water, and here is what you sent me. There isn't five cents' worth of the acid in this mixture.

Druggist—Did you want twenty-five cents worth of carbolic acid itself, sir, with four times its bulk in water added?

Customer—That is exactly what I wanted, sir.

Druggist—Then you should have sent $1.25. Do you suppose I get my water for nothing?—Chicago Tribune.

Marriage customs in India are to be reformed. The bride and groom hereafter must have attained the ages of 14 and 19 respectively. The families will not spend so much in festivities.

A Pittsburg man has invented a glass conduit which he thinks solves the problem of underground electric wires. Plates of glass are grooved on the upper surface, and the wires are laid in the grooves and cemented there with pitch. Then other plates of glass are laid over the first, and wires put upon them in the same way. When all the wires are laid the whole is inclosed in a wooden box and embedded in cement.

CURRENT TOPICS.

THE Queen of Sweden is undergoing peculiar treatment to restore her nerves to a normal condition. Her doctors have ordered her to rise early, make her own bed and dust and sweep the room. She has to take a walk in the garden before breakfast, work among the flowers afterward and lead an active outdoor existence all day long. Already the Queen has been benefitted by this curious "cure," the "chambermaid treatment," as it is called.

POLYDORE DE KEYSER, Lord Mayor of London, seems to be a most remarkable man. His eccentricities are almost startling. Not long ago he inspected the boys of the British naval training-ship Warspite. During his address he told the boys that his wife would take great pleasure in giving each one of them a shilling, which he hoped "they would keep throughout their future lives as a souvenir of the occasion."

ENGLAND has now many attractions to present to the stranger in the shape of cathedrals alone. Restorations and completions have been going on for many years, and much of the domestic wealth of the country has found an outlet in church decoration and church architecture. One of the grandest of the old buildings was Bristol Cathedral, dating as far back as 1142, and partially rebuilt in the fourteenth and sixteenth centuries. The work of restoration begun some years ago has just been completed at a cost of $400,000.

OLIVER P. RAHM, inventor of the self-scratching match, is living quietly in Booneville, N. Y. He is now an old man, and his fortune, estimated at $250,000, gives him every comfort and successfully keeps the wolf from the door. His famous match was an inspiration which came to him in sleep. On retiring he had attempted to light his gas with an ordinary match, in doing which he burned his fingers. He had a dream which suggested the device by which he made a fortune.

THERE is a movement on Lord Zetland's estates to "celebrate suitably" the jubilee of his earldom. He is, however, a sensible man, and has written that while he has no objection to the proposal he must stipulate that there shall be "no fuss" concerning himself. The fact is that the Earldom of Zetland was given by the Queen to Lord Dundas simply because he had loaned large sums of money to the Duke and Duchess of Kent and had shown himself to be a most accommodating creditor.

IN England a man may call himself almost anything he pleases and nobody will object. For something like 30 shillings he may advertise in the Times the taking of a new name, and thereafter he will be John Jones or William Smith, just as he prefers. There is little or no litigation over titles or names, which are really nowhere of less importance. A man may call himself Lord So-and-So, and, though he may be laughed at about the clubs, nobody will take the trouble to dispossess him of the empty title.

A GERMAN paper recommends a solution of paraffine in heavy coal tar oil for the purpose of protecting walls exposed to the weather. Papered walls which showed dampness in wet weather gave no traces of it after an external coating of this preparation had been applied. One part of paraffine and two to three parts of coal tar oil is solved in a moderate heat; sufficient oil must be used to prevent the solution from becoming sticky. The vessel containing it must stand in hot water while the paint is being applied, which must be done on hot days when the bricks or stone are thoroughly dry. One coat is sufficient.

IT has been reported that some workmen while tearing down a building on New Bond street in London discovered a roll of canvas, which turned out to be the portrait of the Duchess of Devonshire, which was cut out of its frame in May, 1876, and disappeared under mysterious circumstances. Messrs. Agnew had purchased the picture for £10,000 about three weeks before the theft took place, and the only tidings they had received of it since then was a letter from this country, in which the writer offered to restore the portrait for a stipulated sum. Inquiries made have not yet verified the report.

IT is announced that five patents were recently issued to a Baltimore electrician covering methods and apparatus for heating by electricity. The inventor, it is claimed, has made a radically new departure in the art of converting electricity into heat, whereby the losses incident to all previous efforts in that direction have been practically overcome. By this system dwellings and other buildings can be supplied with heat from central generators by the same conductors which now supply them with incandescent electric lights, and at a cost considerably less than the methods of heating now in vogue.

EXHAUSTIVE experiments in the manufacture of aluminium have recently been made at the Krupp works at Essen Germany, and with the most gratifying results. The metal is turned out pure in chunks, some of which weigh nearly 100 pounds, and the cost of production is said to be considerably less than a shilling (25 cents) per pound. A company has been formed in England for managing the process on a large scale, and its patents also cover the manufacture of sodium, potassium and artificial cryolite. There can be no doubt that when once aluminium is offered for sale at a few cents per pound, it will come into general use.

MR. FLETCHER, Chief Inspector of Alkali Works in Great Britain, in the course of his annual report deals with a subject of much interest to manufacturers. In remarking upon Mr. Hargreave's hot air engine, or thermo moto, he says that it will not only effect the prevention of black smoke, but promise to revolutionize our methods of producing power. It has been found that energy of forty horse-power can be obtained with the expenditure of two gallons of coal tar, or 45 pounds of coal per hour. Either liquid fuel or coal can be used. This result is five or six times more favorable than that realized by ordinary steam engines.

A NEW factory in Grapeville, O., will commence the manufacture of glass upon a new system, which, it is confidently expected, will prove far superior to the old method now in vogue. In making glass under the present system the factories must remain idle while the pots are being charged with melted glass, while under the new innovation this difficulty is surmounted by the division of the tank in two compartments, one being used for the purpose of melting while the blowing part is stored in the other. This permits a continuous supply to the blower and obviates the necessity of idleness during the time consumed in charging a pot.

ERASTUS BRIMMER, who committed suicide in New Jersey the other day, had long been famous for his phenomenal appetite, which gained him the nicknames of "Pete the Eater" and "Hungry Pete." No farmer ever kept him over a month. He would eat at meals enough for six ordinary hands, and outside of meals was continually seeking food. One day he ate three medium-sized baskets of peaches and topped off with a pint of molasses. On another occasion he ate four dozen doughnuts, washed down by three quarts of milk. He was never known to be troubled by indigestion.

GREAT interest is taken in the East in the railway between Siam and Southwestern China, which will be about 1,000 miles long. It has been surveyed, but more surveyors are going out from England. It is expected that this railway will postpone for a long time the construction of a line between Tonquin and China. The China Railway Company has, by the way, completed its line as far as Tang-ku, and in April the train began to run from that point to Tong-san. The remaining section of the line, between Tang-ku and Tien-Tsin, will be pushed on with unremitting energy, and in a few months' time the "flying wheels" will be making their revolutions to the delight and amazement of the people of Tien-Tsin.

THE experiment of tobacco growing in England, which has just been tried, has been so successful that in the course of a short time those persons who have been expressing in a very decided manner the opinion that a tobacco crop is that to which agriculturists will soon look to enable them to pay their rent, may renew their exertions to obtain the sanction of the Excise for the planting of tobacco on a large scale. Since the time of Charles II. this represents one of the first experimental crops brought to maturity and passed through the various processes of manufacture. The mere rearing of tobacco plants seems to be comparatively easy; but whether the enterprise can be pursued successfully while current excise obligations remain represents a problem that awaits future solution.

THE London Lancet publishes a suggestion relative to the fitting out of ships for the accommodation of phthisical and convalescents generally, with the view of giving them the medical benefit of pure sea air. The proposition, though not new, is excellent. The ships might cruise near enough shore to supply the invalids with fresh meats and vegetables. There are many people who, as the Philadelphia Medical News says, "are suffering from lung hunger and lung thirst and might regain their lost health if they could get access to the limitless supplies of fresh and pure ocean air, for the like of which they pant at home." An advantage of paramount importance in the ocean hospital is that it would give consumptives exemption from the excessive crushing changes of temperature which are so frequent on land, and which, perhaps, more than any other climatic causes, send thousands into the grave.

"BUT you must not think that, with all those pleasant surroundings, I am not anxious to get home," says ex-Warden William J. McGarigle in a letter written to a Chicago friend. "There is only one Chicago. I served it well and honestly, and would like to spend my days there." Without attempting to pass judgment on the truth of the closing statement of Mr. McGarigle's letter, the News says that the gentleman is eminently correct as regards the unique character of the city. There is but one Chicago. But the ex-warden should remember that there are also one weary and waiting sheriff, one empty cell, one defeated verdict, one Joliet. These are all thrown in with the one Chicago, and Mr. McGarigle must take them all or none. If the ex-warden can make up his mind to resume business and social relations with the people of this city, he will be received with open arms and handcuffs. His decision on the matter is anxiously awaited.

BUSINESS men, as a rule, write their signatures badly. Usually the signature is the worst written part of the letter. Why is this so? To the owner of the signature it is an easy enough matter to understand it, but easy it is to no one who is unacquainted with it. Those who read character by the handwriting always look carefully at the signature. It tells more than any other part. A good, bold, decipherable signature is a novelty these days, and the hotel registers are too often mere Chinese puzzles, which even the hotel clerks, used to all kinds of signatures, are not always able to decipher. Among business men it is sometimes necessary to cut the signature from a letter and paste it on the envelope in the hope that somebody may be able to decipher it when it reaches the post-office from which it was sent. In many signatures there is a good deal of affectation. People should get into the habit of writing their signatures so legibly that he who runs may read. The signature is something that every man who writes at all writes often enough to be able to write plainly. Why then should he seek to so tangle it up that nobody can tell what it is?

A STUDY of the clauses in the English Local Government Bill relating to the changes in the method of granting liquor licenses, and the compensation to be allowed in cases where such licenses should be refused, serves to show that there was a strong foundation for the public sentiment which compelled the Government to abandon the proposed scheme. In England, from the time of Edward VI., when licenses were first granted, they have never been looked upon as personal favors granted to any man, but as legal limitations and precautions taken against the trade. They created no personal claim beyond the letter of the license; no vested interest for the holder of the license, and, above all, no local privilege in the house where he carried on his trade. The compensation clauses, therefore, of the Local Government Bill virtually created a new law, and that by indirect action. A statement drawn up in opposition to the clauses, based on careful inquiries, showed that a house which had been built at a cost of $4,000, and which had been granted a license, was sold for $31,500. If the license had been withdrawn under the new Bill the compensation would have been fixed at $27,500. Another house, with a license, worth $10,000, was bought by a brewer for $59,500, and the compensation would have been $42,500. The calculation was that the Bill would have endowed and protected the drink trade at a cost of $1,250,000,000. This compensation would have gone not only to publicans but also to brewers, and even still more to ground landlords. The Government surely could not have foreseen and rightly weighed the consequences of these clauses in the Local Bill.

BANANAS A BLESSING THERE.

Salvador Makes Pretty Nearly Everything Out of the Fibers of the Tree.

A young Salvadorian, with the dark eyes and inky hair of his country, talked to a reporter the other day about the Central American banana tree. The tree is 2½ to 3 feet in circumference at its base. Its tapering fibrous body, without a branch, is from 10 to 15 feet in height. The fibers, separated by a thin pith, are as long as the body of the tree. These fibers are used in Salvador, just as they are taken from the tree, as shoe-strings and as cords for all purposes. The natives use them largely for bridal reins and lariats. The raw material costs only transportation to the rope-walks. Each banana tree bears in the twelve months of its existence only one bunch of fruit, but from two to ten trees spring from the roots of the one that has fallen. In Salvador the bunch of bananas is worth fifteen cents, and the dead tree nothing. A cordage factory or paper mill or coffee sack maker, were not the dead trees numberless, would give for each tree ten times the value of the fruit it has produced. Split, dried and packed, the bodies of the banana trees might be shipped profitably to the United States; but there is no reason why some enterprising American would not take them in hand and ship to Salvador the proper machinery for their manufacture, as labor is fully two-thirds cheaper there than in New York. In Salvador ropewalks are found in unfrequented streets and suburban roads. The native machinery consists of a crank attached to an upright board, with which a native boy twists the fibers of the bandana and cactus. A man skilled in the ropewalker's art splices the fibers together, adding to the length and thickness of the revolving cord. The stem of each banana leaf consists of the toughest and finest threads, and these leaves, two and a half and three feet wide, and ten to fifteen feet long, resting on the heads of native women, are umbrellas in the rainy season in roofless market places and streets of Salvador. These are the carpets on which the people sit and the beds on which they sleep. "There is a fine opportunity," said the Salvadorian, "for some enterprising American with a small capital to do a thriving trade and make money by introducing western ideas and machinery to the people of Salvador."—New York Mail and Express.

A Judgment Dress.

Old Mrs. H——, of Mackinac, was one of the most penurious of women. When she lay dying she told her daughter to bring her a many-colored plaid silk dress which she had always worn for her best, and ordered her to divest it of its black breadths.

"They are full enough to make you a gown," said the old woman, "and the front will be all I need."

"If that's what you want of it," said the girl as she stopped ripping, "you can have it all. I wouldn't be seen alive in the old thing, and I should think, mother, that you wouldn't want to go flamming around at the day of judgment with only half a dress on."

That settled it, and the old woman was buried in the whole gown.—Detroit Free Press.

Looked in the Dictionary.

A little girl, 9 years old, was spending the summer in a country boarding house, where she became a great favorite with the other guests. One of them, a young gentleman, was so devoted that his attentions became quite annoying to her.

One day she said to her mother. "Do you think Mr. Brown ought to call me a puny devil?"

"Why, no, my dear," replied her mother, somewhat shocked, "of course not! But are you sure he did? You must be mistaken."

"No, I am not," said the little one, triumphantly. "He called me an 'imp,' and I looked in the dictionary to see what it meant, and it said 'a puny devil.'"

Out to See a Woman.

The proper thing now with the "summer girl" is to go out between the acts, just like a man, and drink soda water. A duo or trio of girls go often to the theatre unattended by male escorts, always adopting the English plan, and each paying for her own seat. At the end of an act they get up and flo out to drink soda water, one of them "standing treat" for the entire party. Then they walk back, laughing and chatting for all the world like their brothers. Lots of the girls also accompany their escorts in their entre act journey, and probably enjoy the opera the more for not sitting in their seats while the curtain is down. —Washington Critic.

Worse than an Orphan.

Little Chicago boy—Kin ye help a poor, harmless boy?

Kind citizen—I reckon so. Are you an orphan, sonny?

Boy—I'm wuss ner an orphan. Me fadder an' mudder is both divorced an' married agin' an' I don't know whose boy I am, an' am slowly forgettin' my own name.—Epoch.

A Dutiful Son.

"Yes, our little 4-year-old is such a comfort and such a help to me," said Mrs. Eastside to a lady caller. "Why, he can take care of his little baby sister as well as my nurse. He is in the next room playing with little Dorothy. (Raises her voice)—Val-ter."

"Yeth, mamma."

"What are you doing, Walter?"

"Oh, I'se des playin' at I'se a barber, and I'se shavin' her wif papa's razor." (Tableaux).

THE LOVER'S RETURN.

"That young lady whom you seem to admire so much," said Joe Evans, as we walked around the ball-room, "is Diana Evrescourt. She it was jilted Earl Harcourt. The poor fellow went over to Europe to hide his sorrow and I read in a foreign paper to-day that he lost his life during a terrific storm in the mountains."

As I looked at the girl's lovely face, so pure in its expression, I could hardly believe that she had sent poor Harcourt to his death.

Joe left me a few moments later, and I saw he was talking very earnestly to Miss Evrescourt. I was in the midst of a dashing waltz when a terrific cry startled every one in the room and I turned just in time to see Diana Evrescourt fall heavily to the floor in a dead faint.

In an instant all was confusion. But no effort served to break the deathlike faint, and amid murmuring expressions of sympathy and curiosity as to the cause of her sudden illness, the motionless figure, with its rich robes flowing, and its golden head drooping like a broken flower, was tenderly lifted and carried from the room.

"I am so sorry I broke it to her so harshly," Joe said, as he walked home. "But how should I know she would care? The girl has some heart, after all, it seems."

"Joe," I said, "have you never thought that some mistake may have been the means of parting Harcourt and her? That it might not have been her fault?"

"That could not be," Joe replied decidedly, "for Earl showed me the letter which was sent him breaking their engagement. No girl could have ever loved a man and written as she did."

Two years afterward I was walking through a crowded thoroughfare, when I came face to face with a stalwart-looking young man whom I could have sworn was Earl Harcourt or his twin brother. At once the thought flashed over me that perhaps my friend had escaped death in the mountains, where he was supposed to have perished two years before.

At the risk of making a mistake I stepped to the gentleman's side and told him that his resemblance to my lost friend, Earl Harcourt, prompted me to address him.

"I am Earl Harcourt myself," he said. "And you—yes, I remember—you are Hugo Benton."

That night we talked away into the "wee, sma' hours," and I listened with vivid interest to the account of his great peril and providential escape from death.

"But why have you never returned to America?" I asked him at length.

A shade passed over his face.

"Because," he replied, "America is too full of painful memories for me to ever wish to go back. Save Joe Evans, there is no one there I care for, and I made up my mind long ago (as time went by and brought me no word from him) that new interest must have crowded his old friend from his heart. Of course, I had no idea a false report of my death had reached him, or I should have understood his seeming neglect. When did you see him last, and how is he?"

Now had come the opportunity for which I had been waiting. Drawing Joe's latest letter to me from my pocket I laid it in his hand. It ran in this way—and the reader will not wonder that as Earl Harcourt perused its contents a strong agitation was visible upon his dark face:

"You inquired in your last concerning Miss Evrescourt. I have a reparation to make to her. In my anger for what I deemed her cruel falseness toward Earl Harcourt I spoke and thought bitter things of her, as you know. I have lately learned that the poor girl (equally with my dead friend) was the victim of a cleverly planned plot.

"Her father ardently desired her marriage with a wealthy suitor whom he favored, and thinking if the engagement between her and Earl could be broken there would be no obstacle to his schemes, he himself imitated his daughter's handwriting in the note which sent Earl a broken-hearted man away from his native land.

"It was through a friend, Mr. Evrescourt's lawyer, that I learned the above. While examining his client's papers after his sudden death a few months ago he discovered indubitable proof of what I have told you, and knowing of my affection for Earl and that I blamed Diana for all that occurred he felt it his duty to tell me the facts of the case.

"Even as I write Diana Evrescourt is very ill. I fear she is not long for this world; you know her mother died young."

That was all that bore upon the history I am relating.

As may be readily surmised, the next outgoing steamer numbered among its passengers Earl Harcourt.

Though I was not on hand to witness the meeting, I heard afterward how quickly, in the refulgent light of love which fate had so unexpectedly restored to her, Diana Evrescourt's illness of body and sadness of heart left her.

A feeling of dulness and languor,

Is often the first indication of incipient disease. In such cases the famous "ounce of prevention" is the highest wisdom, and may be found in its most potent form in Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, which, by its wonderful blood-purifying and invigorating tonic properties, will quickly restore the ebbing vitality, repair and strengthen the system, and thus ward off threatening sickness. Its saving influence reaches every organ of the body.

Fiery and anarchistic Louise Michel has given vent to her revolutionary ideas in a drama lately produced at the Theatre des Batignolles in Paris entitled "The Red Rooster."

PAPER.

A Yankee Manufacturer Says That Paper Is Now Made From Nearly Everything.

"We are now making about everything, from a shirt to a car wheel, out of paper; but we are also making paper out of nearly everything," said a Yankee manufacturer to a Telegram reporter.

"The most recent invention in our trade (and it is one which bids fair to revolutionize it altogether) is the process of making paper out of cotton. It was recently discovered by a gentleman from Georgia, who has thus opened up another great industry to the South, for the hulls of the cotton seed, hitherto considered utterly worthless—a mere waste, in fact—are now found to be the most valuable for the making of paper pulp.

"The discoverer, after much study, came to the conclusion that the hulls could be made into paper pulp. An analysis of the hull showed that it is composed of nine layers, the two upper ones being black and coarse, while the remaining seven are of very fine fibre, and after being subjected to a certain chemical process can be bleached a fleecy white. About 500 pounds of these hulls were sent to a paper mill for experiment, and the result was the product of the finest textile pulp that the chemist had ever seen, while the paper woven from the pulp makes a much better and smoother article than ordinary 'news print,' as well as a good quality of writing paper."

"Can paper be made cheaper from this pulp than by the old process?"

"The time and cost of reducing the hulls to pulp is only 50 per cent. of what the present process requires, thus the price of paper will be reduced about one-half, while the quality will be much better. Perhaps I can illustrate the exact difference in this way: To reduce the poplar wood to pulp requires twelve degrees of baume liquid, with 120 pounds of steam pressure, and the time consumed is sixteen hours, but with the cottonseed hulls the time is only eight hours, with one-half the liquid and steam pressure.

"In addition the cotton stalks can be used as well for the manufacture of pulp, and by the process stated above can be made to produce a good class of paper."

They "Mean Business."

If any one has given Dr. Sage's Catarrh remedy a fair trial and has not been cured thereby, the manufacturers of that unfailing remedy would like to hear from that individual, for when they offer, as they do, in good faith, $500 reward for a case of nasal catarrh which they cannot cure, they mean just exactly what they say. They are financially responsible, and abundantly able, to make good their guarantee if they fail, as any one can learn by making proper inquiry. Remedy sold by all druggists, at 50c.

"Getting ready to develop my gold mine?"

"What machinery do you take?"

"None. I'll take my wife along. She'll be sure to find the pockets, if there are any."

"What's In a Name?"

Shakspeare said there was nothing, but there is. Would Cæsar have had such notoriety if his name had been Caleb W. Petersgill? Think of Patti drawing $7,000 a night if the bill-boards announced her as Jane Brown! The idea is absurd. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets is a name that has made a record. These tiny, sugar-coated pills cure sick and bilious headache, bowel complaints, internal fever and costiveness.

The Shoe & Leather Reporter, N. Y., and Shoe & Leather Review, Chicago, the leading trade papers of the U.S. in the Hide line, have sent their representatives to investigate Mr. Page's business, and after a thorough examination and comparison the Reporter gives him this endorsement

"We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."

And the Review says

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in his specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

FLESHERTON:

THURSDAY, AUG. 2, 1888.

VALEDICTORY.

With this issue a new era in the history of THE ADVANCE commences—one, too, full of sadness to myself, because of the severance of many ties of warm friendship. Dear reader, your Editor for more than seven years is about to "step down and out." Next week the editorial chair will be occupied by my successor, Mr. W. H. Thurston, for whom—knowing his personal worth—I bespeak that extensive patronage and cordial moral support extended towards me during my business career in Flesherton. May the new era be a bright and prosperous one for Editor and readers!

One of the most difficult things in this world is to bid farewell to true and tried old friends. It is especially the case with me. I can scarcely find words to express my feelings. The past comes rushing before me like a vision of the night. Back through the years that have come and gone, in sunshine and in darkness, I can see the cheery faces and hear the encouraging words of the dear old friends of the past and the present. Did adversity come, the dear old faces beamed forth as brightly as when the sunshine of prosperity scattered its beams along our pathway. In the hour of trial, there they were, as true and firm as the everlasting hills. In the hour of triumph and success, they were the first to share in our happiness and speak words of good advice. All through those seven years and four months they have been loyal to THE ADVANCE and its Editor. Full of gratitude and affection for these dear old "hearts of oak," the Editor bids them farewell, with the hope, of course, of meeting with them occasionally after he has gone out from their midst and taken his place in another sphere.

The path of duty is frequently strewn with thorns, and he who faithfully carries out the honest dictates of his conscience, must necessarily collide with all kinds of disturbers of the public peace. The inevitable follows: enemies are made. We have made enemies, but, in this parting hour, we bear them no malice. If we have made such, through ignorance of the facts in any case, we sincerely ask to be forgiven; if the contrary, we heartily forgive. Errare est humanum.

On the 1st day of April, 1881, we commenced business in Flesherton—a mere hamlet at that time, containing less than three hundred people. There were only three or four brick buildings in the place at the time. Seven years later we find a flourishing village, with handsome public buildings, business blocks and private residences, and new structures constantly being added. The population, too, has been more than doubled. We merely mention these things to show the rapid and substantial growth of the place. And while we do not wish it to be inferred that THE ADVANCE has been the element in bringing about such a desirable state of things, it cannot be denied that it has been an important factor. THE ADVANCE was established on the 1st of June, 1881, and has been growing in public favor, we are glad to say, ever since. To use a familiar phrase, this journal has "had its ups and downs," but to-day it is firmly established, and we now pass the reins of power to our esteemed successor with everything in trim condition for doing a more extensive business even than has been done in the past. In this connection, we are pleased to announce that the policy of THE ADVANCE will be continued on the old lines.

Yearly advertising contracts will be continued until the completion thereof by Mr. Thurston, my successor; but all such contracts are payable to me up to date, August 1st; from that date until completion of said contracts they are payable to Mr. Thurston. Subscribers of THE ADVANCE, who are in arrears, are kindly asked to pay their subscriptions to Mr. Thurston; those who have paid in advance will receive their paper as usual.

We have every confidence in the ability and integrity of Mr. Thurston, and ask our friends to accord him a warm welcome and a hearty support. He is a native of this County—(in fact, both he and myself first saw the light in the same Township, viz., Euphrasia)—a practical printer, and a clever journalist. He is also somewhat of a poetical genius, and we venture to prophesy that there will be some bright things in the Poet's Corner from time to time. But we need not multiply words, as the public will shortly have ample opportunity to draw its own conclusions.

We would like to say more, but space forbids. We now step down and out and bid our readers adieu. The parting, on our part at any rate, is tinged with sadness, when we remember the old friends and the loved scene of our first venture; but we look out hopefully upon the great business world beyond, and take fresh courage.

Farewell!

Gratefully yours, dear friend and reader,

A. R. FAWCETT.

[Just as THE ADVANCE was going to press I received a telegram accepting my offer, re purchase of the Newspaper and Job Printing plant of the Streetsville Review. In a week or two at farthest, all being well, I will make my bow to the people of Streetsville and County of Peel. Such is life!—Ever yours, A. R. FAWCETT.]

SALUTATORY.

As stated in last week's issue, a change has been made in the proprietorship of this paper. With the first number under the new management I feel it my duty to give a few words of greeting to new friends. In looking over the list of subscribers I notice many personal friends among them—friends whom I have known for many years, and whose goodwill I prize. But there are hundreds whom I do not know personally, and consequently I am called upon to introduce myself. This is my native county, and the place is dear to my heart as the "home of my childhood." In fact it is simply a case of a chicken coming home to roost.

For several years I have watched with pleasure the successful career of my predecessor, Mr. Fawcett, and I desire to pay a tribute to his business ability, tact, perseverance and foresight in establishing and guiding to so successful an issue the venture which he embarked upon seven years ago. He departs from Flesherton with the well-wishes and hearty god-speed of all our citizens, who sincerely hope his future field of labor will be still more useful, and, financially, even more successful than has that of the past.

As to the future course of this paper, I prefer not to say a great deal at present. Certainly there is an ideal. That ideal is to give a bright, newsy paper, and one that will still be a credit to the town which gives it birth, and constitute a big value to its patrons for their money. Whether that ideal will be gained I leave my readers to decide.

In closing this little conversation I would just say that I desire your co-operation: any schemes for the future advancement and prosperity of this town and its surrounding townships will receive mine. Finally, and above all, assist us with your patronage, and—keep your eye on us. I remain,

Ever yours,
W. H. THURSTON.

News scarce.

Haying about finished. Crop very good and saved in prime condition.

Fall wheat harvest has commenced. The crop is a very fair one.

The late rains have made a great change in the appearance of the spring crops. Turnips are a failure. Potatoes look well. Bugs are very plentiful.

Mr. Hogg's saw mill was burned last week. Have not learned the amount of loss or insurance, if any.

Mr. Robert Buchanan and Arthur Johnston have each made a large sale of cattle.

Holidays now and the small boy is in the height of his glory.

The tonic and alterative properties of Ayer's Sarsaparilla are too well kgown to require the specious aid of any exaggerated or fictitious certificate. Witnesses of the marvelous cures affected by this preparation are to-day living in every city and hamlet of the land.

Farmer's and People's Institute.

Singhampton, July 26th—A Public Meeting in compliance with a Requisition to J. R. Sing, Esq., President of the Farmer's Council for Osprey and Nottawasaga Union School section of Singhampton, was held here on Wednesday evening July 25th, when a farmer's and people's Institute, was successfully instituted, with William Pearson, President, David Grant Sr. and George Thompson, vice President, John Stinson, Treasurer, and David Grant, jr., Secretary. Other officers were also elected. Among other business transacted the following is a synopsis:—That monthly Public Fairs shall be held in Singhampton under the auspices of said Farmers and People's Institute, and that the first of said Public fairs shall begin on Monday September 10th, (1888) and continue thereafter on the second Monday of each and every Month, for the sale and purchase or exchange of cattle, horses, and sheep, with other live stock, and articles of agricultural productions and requirements.

That petitions were signed to Nottawasaga and county Simcoe councils to the effect as follows:—Whereas William Lynn, Esq. Deputy Reeve of Sunnidale Township, having presented a petition to the county Simcoe Council calling for a method of Public weighing grain markets, at product buying stations with Monthly cattle, horses, and sheep, selling fairs, therefore petitioners respectfully request that the respective councils will unitedly work so as to have a uniform method of said Public markets and fair established through county Simcoe and in Market Places where necessary in the several counties and Provinces of the Dominion of Canada.

A prominent feature in the platform of the Farmers and People's Institute is that by Regulations to Presidents future meetings be held as may be deemed advisable for Public Discussion, etc., also as was contended that with a general adoption of said Farmer's and People's Institutes and said Public weighing markets certain progressive advantages must follow for agriculturists and the people generally.

THE DARK CONTINENT.

Stanley's Travels and Labors in the Congo Reviewed—The Missionary and His Work—What the Whole Amounts to.

A Paris cable gives the following letter from Richard F. Burton: I do not despair of Stanley, even if the mysterious white pasha of the Bahr-el-Ghazel should turn out to be Emin, which is probable. Stanley is an artist in the surprises, catastrophes and properties of a drama, as well as in its denouement. He is, in fact, a sort of a geographical Sardou and when the world pulls out its cambric handkerchief he will probably come up smiling and ask, "What the deuce is the matter?" I am a great admirer of Stanley. He is simply the prince of African explorers of this day or of any day. But as an administrator I rank him as below par, and the best proof of this is that of all the new stations he has founded on the Congo, at a cruel expense and waste of life and labor, as well as of gold, there is hardly one that has not been abandoned and left to fall in ruin. On the present occasion his avowed object was the rescue of Emin Pasha, who has distinctly and determinedly declined to be rescued, but Stanley's real object was to divert the ivory trade from the long and expensive Zanzibar line to the cheap and safe waterway of the Congo. The idea is excellent. By this means Belgium recoups the millions wasted upon expeditions and stations. Zanzibar, also, under the unprejudiced annexationists, our cousins-German, can have the sole profit of the slave exportation; nor would a Teuton of them all raise a hand against what brings grist to their mills. Stanley has thus, by one touch of his magic wand, converted the Congo Free State, the happy hunting ground of Tippoo Tib and his merry Sawahili men—absurdly named Arabs—into a Congo Slave State par excellence. The great slave mines are now transferred from the Unyamwezi country, the old Mountains of the Moon, to the Upper Congo. These fresh diggings remain to be exploited. Tippoo Tib is made Governor (God save the mark!) of those new slave reserves at a salary of £300 a year, where he can easily make £30,000 a year, and where his followers are pretty sure to shoot him if he talks any nonsense about the abolition of slavery. You must not expect to hear any truths of this kind in England, where the imperious and tyrannical opinion of society subdues even the boldest spirit. A well-known administrator was sent to the Congo, and after a careful inquiry found Mohammedanism a grand and saving fact, and set down the Christian missionary as an utter humbug in all except being a doughty explorer, a laborious and useful linguist and an able collector of other men's money. The administrator goes home fully resolved to state the facts uncompromisingly before the public of Great Britain; but, although the administrator is an honest man, the influence and association of old ideas trooping back into his brain, so act upon him that so far from stating the facts he states clean to the contrary. He stands up and declares that missionaries are the cream of creation and that the gospels are overspreading the land, while, if he mentions Islam, it is in a patronizing tone, as if Mohammed were a mere courier to the founder of Christianity. All this is utterly unfair. It allows the unfortunate public no chance of learning the truth. The narrator may be honest and honorable, but he dare not state the facts nor have the courage of his own opinions. If he did society would turn upon him with the usual "Oh, no, we never mention him!" and his name never would be heard unless accompanied by a snarl or sneer. The fact is, England's chronic disease is religiosity in the few and hypocrisy in the many.

Desperate Attempt at Suicide.

A Montreal despatch says: A singular case of attempted suicide occurred on the Longueuil ferry wharf yesterday morning. A well-dressed, middle-aged man was seen coming on the wharf and violently striking his head against one of the mooring posts on the wharf three or four times. The people who were standing at a distance hurried to the spot, where they found the man lying on the ground, with a large gash in his head and apparently dying; but what was their surprise when they tried to raise him from the ground to see him jump up and with a bound throw himself into the river. When he came up for the first time he made the sign of the cross and raised his eyes to heaven; but when he saw that one of the men on the wharf was jumping after him, he ducked his head under water and bubbles rose rapidly. Simpson succeeded in holding the would-be suicide when the latter rose a second time. "For God's sake, let me go down," almost inaudibly uttered the half dead man. His rescuer, however, would not listen and brought him to shore, where Renaud, for such was his name, asked the bystanders, "Please, let me drown, or kill me one of you." The would-be suicide was ascertained to be Albert Renaud, a well-to-do grocer. He is believed to have been suffering with delarium tremens.

A Dot for Hard Drinkers.

A Russian physician named Portugaloff declares that strychnine is an infallible cure for drunkenness, administered in subcutaneous injections. The effect of the strychnine solution is to change the craving for drink into positive aversion, and this change is effected in a day. After a treatment of eight or ten days the patient may be discharged. The strychnine is administered by dissolving one grain in two hundred drops of water, and injecting five drops of the solution every twenty four hours.

Why They Didn't Speak.

He—Why, there's Johnson and his wife walking across the street and they haven't spoken a word to each other in four months.

She (with great interest)—You don't say so. Tell me all about it. Why did they quarrel?

He—They didn't quarrel.

She (disappointedly)—They didn't? Why didn't they speak for four months, then?

He—Because they couldn't. He was away in Europe for that time.

She—O! you brute.

A SUICIDE'S LIFE

Might Have Been Saved by Three Men, But They Were Afraid to Cut Her Down.

A New York despatch says: Miss Annie Stillwell, a boarder at the house of Charles Johnson, on Carpenter street, in Camden, committed suicide yesterday, but she might have lived to die a natural death if three men had done as they ought and not have had silly scruples. Yesterday afternoon Mrs. Johnson saw Miss Stillwell come in and go up-stairs early in the day. As this was an unusual thing for her boarder to do she mentioned the fact soon afterward to her husband and got him to go to Miss Stillwell's room to see if she was sick. Mr. Johnson is an invalid himself, and it was only with great effort he climbed the stairs. He knocked and knocked but received no response, and as he was too weak himself to break in the door called over to Joseph Butcher, who was at work on the next house, to come in and help him. Mr. Butcher came and burst in the door, and the two men were horrified to see Miss Stillwell hanging by a rope around her neck, apparently dead. Neither of the men would touch her, so they called in Isaac Lovett and asked him to cut her down, but he wouldn't because, like the other men, he believed no one had a right to touch a suicide but the coroner. They sent for Dr. Beale, who cut the rope and found the woman just dying. He endeavored to revive her, but she died soon, and then the three men were sorry they had not cut her down when they discovered her, as her life could have been saved. Miss Stillwell was in her nightdress, and near her was found a note saying:

"Dear P——, I have no home. May God have mercy on my soul! Dear cousin, forgive me, for Jesus' sake! Mother, brother and sisters forgive! Oh! I ask all to forgive me that I have ever wronged. Good-bye."

Miss Stillwell had not been in perfect health lately, and was inclined at times to be erratic and did many queer things. She was well known in Camden.

Temperance Notes.

The various temperance bodies of Tasmania have resolved on positive action against the liquor traffic. Encouraged by the success of local option in Victoria, Tasmania has decided to come to the front.

The opening of the Prohibition Park on Staten Island was one of the features of the celebration of the "glorious Fourth" in the metropolitan district. Ex Gov. St. John, Dr. Funk and other notable temperance advocates were among the speakers of the day.

Miss Willard's suggestion that the white rose be adopted as the emblem of the Prohibition party to offset the red rose of the democracy is being received with enthusiasm. If the Republicans would don the yellow rose, the campaign of 1888 might very properly be called the war of the roses.

The Young Women's Christian Temperance Union of Poughkeepsie, N.Y., has placed wall-pockets in the buildings occupied by the volunteer fire companies of that city and expects soon to have them also in other places. These pockets are kept filled with religious papers and other good literature.

Directors of the London and Northwestern Railway have shown their appreciation of the movement by establishing temperance houses at many stations along their line for the accommodation of their employees. These taverns have been successful from a financial as well as a social and moral point of view.

A prominent liquor dealer in Parkersburg, W. Va., applied to the court for the renewal of his license. The court after listening to petitions and protests and the argument of the counsel granted the license. Immediately the daughter of the liquor dealer, a beautiful young woman, a deputy clerk of the county, rushed into the court room and demanded to be heard. The court granted a hearing. For twenty minutes she held the judge and audience spell-bound by her eloquent pleading against granting her father a license to sell drink. The judge reversed the decision and refused the license.

Mrs. H. B. Kells, one of the most accomplished women in the south, has come out into the prohibition party movement in Mississippi, and is to edit a W. C. T. U. paper which has just been started for that State. Mrs. Kells has long been devotedly attached to the white ribbon movement, and although she has done excellent service, has not until now made it her occupation to help in this work. She is an acquisition of which any society in any State or city might be proud. Mrs. Kells expects to attend the national convention in New York city.

The National Temperance Society will hold its annual temperance camp-meeting at Ocean Grove, beginning Wednesday, Aug. 1st, and continuing five days. Addresses will be delivered by George W. Bain, Edward Carswell, Mrs. Emily L. McLaughlin, Bishop J. P. Newman, Miss Julia Colman, Rollo Kirk Bryan, Gen. C. B. Fisk, Rev. Dr. T. L. Poulson, Rev. W. C. Steele and others. The Park sisters, of Boston, and Mrs. Alice J. Osborne, soprano of Tremont Temple, Boston, will furnish music. The meeting will be under the management of J. N. Stearns, Corresponding Secretary of the society.

New Style of Pride.

Two little misses belonging to different households but living in the same neighborhood, on the east side, have ceased to speak as they pass by. Death lately robbed one of them of a baby brother. The other evening she went by the house of a neighbor while her former companion was sitting on the doorstep with a young lady. Both with a toss of the head and a swing of their skirts expressed their mutual contempt. "Why!" said the young lady to the one on the doorstep, "don't you speak to Maggie any more?" "No, I don't," was the response; "she thinks she's awful smart just because their baby died."—Buffalo Courier.

SOME friends of Yseult Dudley, the young Englishwoman who shot O'Donovan Rossa, are making an effort to secure her release from the asylum for insane criminals at Auburn. There is some question as to the legality of the detention of a person who is not a criminal in the eyes of the law in an institution maintained by the State for the care and custody of those sentenced to imprisonment on conviction of a crime.

THE UNBURIED DEAD.

Some who Walked About Two Thousand Years Ago.

The dead of ancient Egypt are exhibiting in the Egyptian Hall, says the London News, and it is a curious, mournful spectacle. Mr. Flinders Petrie has been digging at Hawara in the Fayoum, and has brought his mortuary spoils to England. The most remarkable thing in the gallery is an assortment of Egyptian portraits, painted in wax. At a late period, after the Roman annexation of Egypt, it became usual to fix the portrait of the dead on the outside of the mummy case. Some twenty or more of these effigies are here, and visitors will be surprised by the vivid coloring, the life-like, modern air. Here are beautiful women with large, dark eyes; here are men in the prime of life, with the characteristic hard Roman face. Here, above tiny mummies, are touching portraits of little girls, dead in their sixth winter, like the child Erotion, whom Martial so tenderly laments. One portrait of Artemidorus represents a handsome young man with a gilded laurel crown—he may have been a poet, and may have contributed to the "Anthology." The whole array of vivid characteristic heads, unburied after 1600 years, and in some instances still attached to their lacquered mummy cases, must impress every observer with a sense of the fleeting of time. They might have been painted yesterday. But Artemidorus, within that red case and under these gilded figures of the dog-headed god of the graves, has been dead nearly 2,000 years. We cannot say he has been dust. The head of a lady, with the long hair pins yet in her hair, with the silken lashes on her cheeks, is exhibited apart. This has a ghastly look; ghastly, too, is the malicious look of life on the gilt face and beaded eyes of an older mummy case. These faces, in high relief, are stiff and unnatural, not like the portraits, but certainly they were portraits, too, in their way. The slippers, the combs, the toys, the glassware of the dead, are gathered here, and here is the sham copper money which was buried with them long after Christianity came in, that they might pay their way in Amenti or Hades. Broken false coin was good enough for the dead, and the mummies of Hawara carried with them no silver or gold; nay, even their poor copper money they never spent in the kingdom of Osiris. Mr. Flinders Petrie has discovered many other things curious and less melancholy. Among them is a terra cotta, representing a Roman lady in a sedan chair, with two chairmen, one of whom is looking back over his shoulder. The chair had windows and folding doors to close in front when the weather was cold or wet. Mr. Flinders Petrie has also brought a papyrus of the second book of the Iliad, which he has not yet unrolled. The writing is extremely beautiful, as easy to read as print, and in this very different from our other Homeric papyri. These were manifestly fragments of cheap editions, and their readings are worthless. Mr. Petrie's papyrus appears to contain an excellent text, though doubtless later than the revision of Aristarchus (160 B. C.)

The Revival.

A gentleman writes to ask if we believe the John street revival is a healthy kind of excitement and likely to accomplish any permanent good.

Well, from our secular standpoint we can look at it in a cold, calm and critical fashion. It is an interesting movement—a popular outburst, indicative of an appetite on the part of thousands for something they have not had as a regular diet. It deals in none of your conservative methods, packed in ice, and so eminently respectable that it is considered indecorous to exhibit any emotion; but is one of the old-fashioned affairs, like a conflagration, or a fire in a dry pine forest where the crackling and roaring of the flames are both superb and awful. It holds sinners over the pit, throws them into the brimstone lake and then asks them how they like it, and if they want to come ashore. There is an element of terror in it, but a predominance of earnest and eloquent persuasion and pleading.

Yes, we like to see a man, like this young Harrison, and his fellow workers, who are in dead earnest. If they go a little too far, why, the rest of the world don't go far enough. If he makes the devil devilish and warns his hearers that they are going to have a warm spell by and by unless they hold up—well, we rather think he won't do any harm. Most men are pachydermatous, and it takes a sledge hammer to make an impression.

As a rule you needn't be afraid of anybody's getting too much religion. Besides, this is a free country, and no one need go to hear the preaching unless he wants to. He is not taken by the scruff of the neck and lugged into church, but does as he pleases. The crowds that attend the meetings seem to be satisfied, and therefore the best thing for you to do is to give them your good wishes, and then stay away if you don't like them.—New York Herald.

Exclusiveness of "Society."

The number of people who have real merit and talent for society who are kept out by the exclusiveness of self-constituted tyrants of society must be very large; but if they have tact and learn to wait they will find their way. The most certain way to please is to show a modest indifference to the smiles of the great. (They call it patronage in England. We have no such ugly word here, nor have we any really "great people" socially.) They should not "push." There is, however, always an ideal exclusiveness, a society which should only admit the cultivated, the wise, and the good. Every hostess should inquire into the general characteristics of her guests, their moral, social and political standing. We use the word political in its largest sense. In spite of all we can do, objectionable men and women do get into the most carefully guarded society; and we have as yet no such inviolable insight that we can rate Dives and Lazarus before their deaths as they are said to be rated afterwards.—Mrs. M. E. W. Sherwood.

Waiter (desiring to mollify him)—May be not, sar. Hit's de paper de bill was made out on.

FAILURE OF TURRET FORTS.

The Professors of Fortification Must Invent Something New.

The Times published, upward of a month ago, an account of the experiments in firing with the steel cupola turrets manufactured at the works in St. Chamond, Chatillon and Commentry. It was explained that the discovery of the new explosives had induced the military engineers to construct forts composed of an enormous block of concrete, within which the space was obtained necessary to receive a small garrison, stores, and the turret, or two turrets, armed with cannon, sometimes simply rotary like those of St. Chamond, sometimes rotary, descending and ascending, like those of Chatillon and Commentry. The firing with the turrets had given excellent results.

The second portion of the experiments, not less important and interesting, has just been conducted in the presence of M. de Freycinet. The question was whether the turrets, after their great success in firing on the enemy, could themselves stand fire. Had this been the case, France, by means of a series of forts, could have supplied the gap on her frontiers and stopped the invader long enough to mobilize behind the protection of these works.

Unfortunately, the experiment does not seem to have been satisfactory. The turrets were shattered by the first shot, and became terrible projectiles, for the fragments of steel struck with the violence of a cannon ball. The firing, it is true, was at 140 metres, whereas in a real siege the distance would be 3,000 or 4,000 metres. There is, however, nothing to show that the accuracy and force of the explosives would be lessened by distance, so that the result is very significant, for the possibility of an effective armament of frontiers, if what is said be correct, is placed in doubt.

The coating of concrete, indeed, has resisted, but this is an illusory resistance for a fort, and is no obstacle to an enemy's march. The newspapers to-day argue that the fortress must be coated with concrete, but this is a hazardous inference. If the fort resists, while its guns are speedily silenced, it stands for a little, whether of concrete or not. Some way must be found of arming the forts for aggressive purposes; then only can they supply a substitute for a strong frontier and stop the march of the enemy. It would be better to have cannon without walls than walls without cannon, and after the experiment of Chalons it is apparent that the struggle will continue between the engineers who construct and the artillerymen who destroy.

One conclusion, however, which was not looked for at Chalons resulted clearly from the last experiments, namely, that an iron plate, whatever its thickness, does not offer sufficient resistance to the new explosives, and that iron-clad ships are already practically useless, and are condemned without ever having had a chance of showing what they could do. How many millions have been spent in vain! What labor has been thrown away, without one experiment being made which could be turned to account!—London Times.

A Domestic Dialogue.

"How do you like my new dress?" inquired Mrs. De Jaison of her husband.

"Isn't it a little"——

"No, it isn't. Now, Alfred, I think you're just horrid. It's the new color, emerald green."

"Yes, dear, but I was only going to say"——

"Oh, I know! That it isn't the color I ought to wear. If it was that horrid Miss —— you would think it lovely."

"But I didn't mean"

"Yes, you did, too. You're mean enough for anything. And you've never noticed my new chip hat, either."

"Why, my love, I thought"——

"You thought! Of course you did—that it makes me look frightful. I—I—declare it's to-o-o b-a-d!"

"If you'd only let me speak"——

"Speak! Why, what else have you done for the last half hour—just to find fault too, with everything I had on. What's that? A diamond for my birthday present? Oh, you dear, precious old sweet! Why didn't you say so, and not tease me so? I could not imagine what you wanted to say."—Detroit Free Press.

Going into Particulars.

The superintendent of schools in a Plymouth county town, we will call him Mr. A., one day visited a school taught by Miss B., and in the course of the morning said:

"Now, children, I wish you to take notice what I do and then write an account of it."

Then he stepped to the blackboard and wrote a sentence upon it.

All the children except one wrote in effect that Mr. A. came into the school and wrote on the blackboard, "I love a good school."

One little fellow, however, followed instructions more literally, and completed the story by adding, "and then he went to the platform, sat down, played with his watch chain, twirled his mustache and winked at Miss B."—Old Colony Memorial.
